Whereas the stockholders of the Bank of the United States, at a general meeting duly convened on the nineteenth day of February last, did, among other things, adopt the following resolutions, that is to say: "Whereas the Legislature of Pennsylvania, by an act entitled 'An act to repeal the State tax on real and personal property, and to continue and extend the improvements of the State by railroads and canals, and to charter a State Bank, to be called the United States Bank,' have incorporated the present stockholders of the Bank of the United States, (excepting the United States and the Treasurer of the United States,) and such other persons as may become stockholders, agreeably to the by-laws made for that purpose, upon the terms and conditions in the said act set forth and contained, a copy whereof has been exhibited to this meeting: And whereas it is provided in the said act, that nothing therein contained shall take effect until the several sections and provisions relating to the Bank of the United States shall have been accepted by the stockholders thereof, at a general meeting: And whereas it is deemed expedient by the stockholders of the Bank of the United States, duly convened in general meeting, to accept the said charter, and the several sections and provisions of the said act relating to the Bank of the United States:

24th Cong. 2d Sess.]

Claim of United States on U. S. Bank.

"Therefore, be it resolved, and it is hereby resolved, by the stockholders of the Bank of the United States, convened in general meeting according to law, That they do hereby accept the several sections and provisions relating to the Bank of the United States, contained and set forth in the act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, entitled 'An act to repeal the State tax on real and personal property, and to continue and extend the improvements of the State by railroads and canals, and to charter a State bank, to be called the United States Bank,' and that the president be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to make known this acceptance to the Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, according to the provisions of the said act.

"And be it further resolved, by the stockholders aforesaid, That the president and directors of the Bank of the United States incorporated by the United States be, and they are hereby, authorized to pay, transfer, and deliver, to the Bank of the United States incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania, all and singular the shares, parts, purports, interest, and property whatsoever, of the stockholders so incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania, of and in the goods, chattels, moneys, effects, and estate, real and personal, of the present Bank of the United States."

And whereas the said Bank of the United States incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania is now organized and ready to commence operations, and is capable of receiving and acting in conformity with the said resolutions: therefore,

1. Resolved, That all and singular the shares, parts, purports, interest, and property whatsoever, of the stockholders so incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania, of and in the goods, chattels, moneys, effects, and estate, real and personal, of this bank, be, and they hereby are, paid, transferred, and delivered, to the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania.

2. Resolved, That all and singular the money, goods, chattels, rights, credits, and personal estate whatsoever, owned by or belonging to, or in the custody and possession of this bank, whosoever the same may be, together with all evidences and securities for the same, be, and the same hereby are, assigned, transferred, and conveyed, to the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania, for the following considerations and upon the following trusts and conditions: that is to say, 1st. That the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania will, with and out of the same, pay, satisfy, and discharge, all debts, contracts, and engagements owing, entered into, or made by this bank, as the same shall become due and payable; and fulfil and execute all trusts and obligations whatsoever, arising from its transactions, or from any of them, so that every creditor or other rightful claimant shall be fully satisfied.

2d. That they will pay and discharge, or furnish the means of paying and discharging, the necessary expenses of conducting and winding up the business of this bank during the remaining term of its charter, in such sums and at such times as shall be called for by the president and directors.

3d. That they will pay and satisfy the Government of the United States for their share, and the share of the Treasurer of the United States, which they may be entitled to have and receive, or which they, by mutual arrangement, may agree to accept in satisfaction and discharge of their part or portion of and in the capital stock of this bank, according to the number of shares in the said capital stock holden by them on the day when the charter from the State of Pennsylvania was accepted by the stockholders.

4th. That they will hold all the residue for the benefit of the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania, and the stockholders therein.

3. Resolved, That upon authentic evidence being furnished of the assent of the president and directors of the Bank of the United States incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania to the next preceding resolution, and of their engagement to fulfil the trusts and comply with the terms and conditions thereof, a transfer and delivery shall forthwith be made of all money, goods, chattels, rights, credits, and personal estate, as aforesaid, and of all evidences and securities for the same, together with an agreement or covenant on the part of this bank that they will, from time to time, whenever thereto required, make and execute all such assignments, conveyances, and assurances, as may be devised and deemed necessary to carry the same resolution into effect.

4. Resolved, That, as soon as it is reasonably practicable, a general statement shall be made by a committee of three of this board, in conjunction with a committee of equal number of the directors of the Bank of the United States incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania, (if the president and directors of that bank should agree to appoint one,) taking to their aid three or more judicious citizens of the United States, (not being stockholders of either of the said banks,) of the money, goods, chattels, rights, credits, and personal effects, so transferred and delivered, and a just estimate shall be made also of the value thereof, and of the time or times when the same ought to be considered as cash, and a like estimate of the value of the real estate belonging to this bank, and of the time or times when the same ought to be considered as cash, so as to fix the nett value or price of the whole of the effects of the bank, after all debts and charges shall be paid, (including the expenses hereafter to be incurred,) and also to fix the credit which ought to be allowed, and the instalments in which the said nett price or value ought to be paid; and especially to fix and ascertain the amount or sum which ought to be secured or paid to the United States, and the time or times when the same ought to be paid; which said statement and estimates shall be mutually reported.

5. Resolved, That the real estate belonging to this bank be sold, and disposed of as soon as may be reasonably practicable, and the proceeds of sale and securities therefor be, as the same shall be received, paid over, transferred, and delivered, to the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania.

6. Resolved, That a copy of the above and foregoing resolutions, duly certified under the common seal of this bank, signed by the president and attested by the cashier, by sent to the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania.

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. Sergeant, it was

1. Resolved, That this bank does hereby assent and agree to the said resolutions, and to each and every part thereof, and to all and singular the trusts, terms, and conditions, in the said resolutions, and each and every of them, contained; and does hereby engage and bind itself to do, perform, and execute, the several duties and engagements therein stipulated to be performed and executed, and will, when thereunto required, make and execute any other assurance that may be deemed necessary.

2. Resolved, that a committee of three members be appointed, who, in conjunction with the president and cashier, shall be authorized to receive all moneys, goods, chattels, credits, and personal effects, evidences and securities, and other things that may be transferred and delivered to this bank, by or in behalf of the Bank of the United States incorporated by the United States.

3. Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed, on behalf of this bank, to do and execute the several matters and things to be done under the fourth of the said recited resolutions.

4. Resolved, That certificates of stock be issued, in the form stated below, to each and every of the stockholders in the Bank of the United States incorporated by the United States, (except the United States and the Treasurer of the United States,) for the same number of shares which are standing in their names on the books of the said bank: Provided, That, before any such certificate shall be issued, the certificate or certificates of said bank, for such share or shares, shall first be deposited in this bank, there to remain until the final end and expiration of the charter of the said bank incorporated by the United States, and then to be cancelled.

5. Resolved, That a copy of the above and foregoing resolutions, duly certified, signed by the president and attested by the cashier, be sent to the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States incorporated by the United States.

The president appointed the following members to serve on the committee, under the second resolution, to receive the cash and effects, &c.:

Messrs. Eyre, Lippincott, and Brown.

And the following members to serve on the committee, under the third resolution, to make a valuation of the property transferred to this bank:

Messrs. White, Newkirk, and Price.

No. 34.

Report of a joint committee of the boards of directors of the late and present Bank of the United States.

The undersigned submit to the board of directors of the Bank of the United States chartered by the Government of the United States, and to the board of directors of the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, the following report:

On the 2d of March last, the following resolution was adopted by the board of directors of the Bank of the United States chartered by the Government of the United States, (being one of a series of resolutions providing for the transfer of the effects of that bank to the Bank of the United States chartered by Pennsylvania:)

Resolved, That, as soon as reasonably practicable, a general statement shall be made by a committee of three of this board, in conjunction with a committee of equal number of the directors of the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, (if the president and directors of that bank should agree to appoint one,) taking to their aid three or more judicious citizens of the United States, (not being stockholders of either of the said banks,) of the money, goods, chattels, rights, credits, and personal effects, so transferred and delivered; and a just estimate shall be made, also, of the value thereof, and of the time or times when the same ought to be considered as cash; and a like estimate of the value of the real estate belonging to the bank, and of the time or times when the same ought to be considered as cash; so as to fix the nett value or price of the whole of the effects of the bank, after all debts and charges shall be paid, (including the expenses hereafter to be incurred,) and, also, to fix the credit which ought to be allowed, and the instalments in which the said nett price or value ought to be paid, and especially to fix and ascertain the amount or sum which ought to be secured or paid to the United States, and the time or times when the same ought to be paid; which said statement and estimates shall be mutually reported.

And, on the same day, the following gentlemen were appointed the committee under the resolution: John Bohlen, Caleb Cope, and Robert Ralston, jr.

On the same day, the said resolution was adopted by the board of directors of the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, and the following gentlemen appointed the committee under it: Ambrose White, Richard Price, and Matthew Newkirk.

These gentlemen, in compliance with the resolution, called to their aid the following gentlemen: John Moss, Benjamin W. Richards, and Robert Toland.

The board of nine members, thus organized, proceeded to the execution of their duties. They began by taking as the basis of their operations the monthly statement of the bank on the 3d of March last, which is herewith submitted. That statement being made from reports from the several offices, which require various periods for transmission, to the bank, of course does not represent the actual condition of the offices at the precise period of the 3d of March. The committee, therefore, caused another statement to be made from the subsequent reports of the offices of the dates nearest to the 3d of March, so as to present the exact state of the bank, as near as possible, on that day. This statement is also submitted herewith. They then proceeded to an investigation, in detail, of all the assets of the bank, beginning with—

1. The active debts.—The greater part of the active debt of the bank consists of bills and notes, on which the discount has been paid in advance, and included in the amount of "discount, exchange, and interest," which forms a part of the surplus funds of the bank. So much of the discount so paid in advance as is applicable to time elapsing after the 3d of March last should therefore be deducted from the amount of the bills and notes, in estimating their value on that day. By comparing the amount of the "discounts received" with the amount of "bills discounted" at the parent bank in the six months next preceding the 3d of March, it is ascertained that the average running time from the date of discount, of all the notes discounted in that interval, is eighty-nine days. It may therefore be assumed that, on any given day, (say the 3d of March,) the average time of maturity of all the notes then on hand was $44\frac{1}{2}$ days (or half the original running time) after such given day. These averages of the running time and time of maturity have been applied by the committee to all notes and bills discounted, on whatever security, both at the bank and at the offices.

Another portion of the active debt consists of loans drawing interest at rates varying from four to six per cent. per annum, and payable at the expiration of the times on which it accrues. In computing the value of these loans, the interest accrued and unpaid on the 3d of March should be added to the principal, and a deduction should be made of the difference between the amount and the par value of those which bear inferior rates of interest. To effect these objects, it was found necessary to divide the gross amount of loans into distinct portions, with reference to their several rates of interest, &c., and then, by a process with which accountants are familiar, the average maturity of the items composing each of these distinct portions was carefully ascertained, together with the average time to which interest had been paid. The manner in which these elements have been used in bringing out the results is shown in the statement embodied in this report.

Of the residue of the active debt, the only important items are the notes and balances due by State banks; in regard to which no remark is at present necessary.

2. The suspended debt and real estate.—The value of these having been the subject of periodical examination by committees appointed for the purpose, at the parent bank and at the offices, their reports furnish, of course, the best attainable information. The committee have, therefore, been guided by the estimates of the last semi-annual period, namely, of June and July of this year, which apply exclusively to debts suspended and real estate acquired before the 3d of March last.

After several conferences, involving a full and free discussion of all the subjects referred to them, they have compressed the result of their investigations into the following statement:

Memorial of the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States, praying a settlement of the accounts of the said bank with the United States.

[February 24, 1837.—Referred to the Committee on Finance.

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States, respectfully represents:

That having recently seen among the documents printed by Congress a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he laments that he has not been able to settle with the bank, and invokes the aid of Congress, they deem it proper to state that they are now, as they always have been, ready and anxious to settle; and that not the slightest delay nor the least obstacle of any kind can justly be ascribed to them. This they propose to render obvious in a few words.

In a settlement between the Government and the bank, one of two courses was necessary. The first was to wind up the whole business of the institution, and divide the proceeds; a mode inevitable, had the bank ceased its operations on the 4th of March. But as the institution continued, with no change except the retirement of a single partner, it was deemed a process equally harsh and useless to force the country to pay sixty millions of debts at a moment of general embarrassment, merely to balance the books of the bank; and the second mode was therefore preferred—that of estimating the value of the stock on the 4th of March, and paying the Government its proportion. This was the easiest, and simplest, and fairest mode of adjustment. It was obviously the mode contemplated by Congress, who, on the 23d of June, 1836, authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to receive payment “in such instalments, and payable at such times, and with such rates of interest, as he shall see fit to agree to.” To estimate the value of the stock was, therefore, the first step towards the settlement. Accordingly, soon after the Secretary received his authority from Congress, a report was made by a joint committee of three members of the late bank, three of the new, and three impartial umpires, connected with neither, stating the value of the stock. This valuation on the part of the bank was transmitted to the Secretary, with an offer “that all the materials upon which it is founded will, of course, be submitted to any examination which you may desire to make;” and that the bank “would be equally ready to adopt any mode which may be deemed expedient for making such a division of the assets of the bank as may assure to the Government its just and ample proportion.” To this communication the Secretary answered, on the 19th and 20th of September, as follows: “I have cheerfully accepted your offer to permit an examination to be made of the materials upon which that report is founded;” and will appoint three gentlemen “to investigate those materials, and report to me their views upon them, and also the proper basis of a settlement.” These commissioners accordingly visited the bank, and, after nearly four months, reported. It was naturally presumed that, when they made their report, the Secretary would inform the board of directors whether their valuation accorded with that of the bank, or in what respect it differed, so as to enable the board to accept the terms, or to offer others, or in some mode advance the settlement. It is much to be regretted that such a course was not pursued. But, since the month of September, when the Secretary apprized the board of the coming of the commissioners who were to report their estimate to him, no communication of any kind whatsoever was made to them by the Secretary; but while they were waiting to know whether their valuation was acceptable to him, or in what it was deemed deficient, they were surprised by a communication, not to them, but to Congress, stating the failure of his negotiation. They regret this, because, if the board had been made acquainted with the wishes of the Government, as explained in the report now made to Congress, they would have instantly and cheerfully acceded to them. That regret is deepened by another measure of the Secretary, which seems alike unauthorized and unfortunate.

The act of Congress of the 23d of June, 1836, directed the Secretary to “receive the capital stock belonging to the United States in the late Bank of the United States, in such instalments, and payable at such times, and with such rates of interest, as he shall see fit to agree to, and also to settle and adjust the claim for surplus profits, accruing on said capital stock, on such terms as he may think proper.”

When this act passed, it was perfectly well known to every member of Congress that, for nearly four years preceding, there had been a disputed question of law between the Government and the bank, in regard to damages on a bill of exchange, which the bank had in vain urged the Executive to pursue before the judicial tribunals. The subject had been often before Congress—before the Committee of Ways and Means in 1833, who proposed “no measure in regard to it—before the Committee of Finance of the Senate, who, in their report of the 18th of December, 1834, declared that the right of the bank was “founded in strict law”—that “the retainer was avowedly made to procure a submission to the courts and juries of the country”—and that “if the Government thinks itself wronged by such proceedings, the law prescribes the manner in which it shall seek redress.” With the full knowledge of these facts when Congress authorized the Secretary to settle with the bank for the capital stock and the surplus profits, they certainly could not have intended to refuse the receipt of this capital stock and surplus profits, unless the bank should surrender, unconditionally, its right to a judicial trial of a question which one of their own standing committees had decided in favor of the bank. Yet, without any the slightest authority from Congress, the Secretary, as appears by the public documents, has determined that he will never settle with the bank without a previous surrender of its rights—declaring that, “preliminary to a final adjustment of this interest, the Treasury Department would require that the bank should pay that portion of the dividend on the stock of the United States which had been withheld for damages on the draft upon the French Government.” Now, it is manifest that this is a proceeding which Congress did not authorize, and can scarcely sanction. It cannot be that the Congress of the United States, after passing a law declaring the mode in which questions between the Government and the citizens are to be adjudicated, and after seeing the bank pursue exactly that mode, will now endeavor to force the institution out of the path of law, by refusing to adjust other interests, which have no connexion whatever with that controversy.

The original claim of damages was a necessary act of duty by the bank in favor of the Government, who, if there was any right to draw the bill, had an equal right to the damages. The pecuniary interest involved was and is a matter of indifference. It was only the tone assumed in regard to it, and the evident design of forcing the bank to abandon its rights, which gave importance to the claim, and forbade the surrender of it. The board of directors would deem themselves faithless, not merely to the institution, but to the cause of constitutional freedom, if they could be thus driven from the courts of justice by any menace from an executive officer. They have acordingly decided the question deliberately and irrevocably. If the proffer of a judicial decision is accepted by the Government, the bank will cheerfully abide the result. But until then, there should not be, and there cannot be, any surrender, or concession, or compromise.

The board of directors will now make one final offer to settle, and they make it directly to your honorable bodies, so as to avert the hazard of any further mediation. They learn, from the printed report of the Secretary, that the commissioners would have recommended the following terms of settlement:

To value each share of the stock at $115 58, and receive payment for it by equal instalments, payable in September, 1837, 1838, 1839, and 1840, with six per cent. interest until paid.

The board of directors agree, at once, to those terms, and are ready to carry them into execution.

They do not stop to inquire whether this be not too much. They prefer that it should be too much. They will never differ with Congress about mere sums of money, and are specially anxious to terminate their connexion with the Government in a manner satisfactory to all parties.

By order of the board.

N. BIDDLE, President.

SENATE CHAMBER,

Washington, February 25, 1837.

DEAR SIR: I find this moment, upon my table, a printed copy of the memorial of the bank, presented to the Senate on yesterday, and referred to the Committee on Finance. As Monday is the regular day of meeting of the committee, and the period of the session admonishes us to avoid delay, I enclose to you herein the copy of the memorial, and request from you any facts, within the possession of yourself or of the Department, touching the complaints put forth in the memorial of want of frankness and courtesy on the part of the agents of the Government; and also your views as to any and what action the memorial may call for from the committee or from Congress. In great haste.

I am, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

SILAS WRIGHT, JUN.

The Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

February 27, 1837.

SIR: Your note of the 25th instant, enclosing a copy of the memorial to the Senate concerning the claim of the United States against the bank, and which had been referred to the Committee on Finance, has been received. At this late period of the session of Congress, I refrain from delaying its action on this subject, which is so very desirable before an adjournment, and shall, therefore, not consume time by entering into any very detailed views concerning certain topics connected with the memorial.

The documents relating to this claim, and to the efforts made for its settlement by this Department, which were annexed to the last annual report, and to the special report made by it to both Houses on the 30th of January last, contain sufficient explanations on many of those topics. They will fully show whether most of the complaints stated in the memorial are not, as is there averred in respect to some of the measures of this Department, "alike unauthorized and unfortunate."

The memorialists seem dissatisfied at the course of the Department in referring the whole subject to Congress, though it was not done till after all the attempts for a settlement had failed, which are explained in those documents. They further assert that, on the part of the bank, in relation to this subject, there has not been "the slightest delay," or "the least obstacle of any kind."

But the facts enumerated in the reports and papers before mentioned show that, during the last summer, no reply whatever could be obtained from the bank concerning a settlement, till a second letter was addressed to it by this Department. They show, likewise, that, on the 25th of July, when a resolution of that date was enclosed to me by the bank, holding out the expectation of making an early communication as to a settlement, in consequence of the expected report of their committee, the report was made on the same day, but was not forwarded to this Department till the 10th of the ensuing September; and that certain information, desired in my first letter in June, to aid me in making an arrangement, and the request repeated again in September, has not, after the lapse of so many months, been yet communicated. Without going further into any details as to any delays or obstacles on the part of the bank in the preliminary correspondence, it appears, further, that the Department, in its letter of September last, as well as through its agents or commissioners in their subsequent letter, urged the bank to pay over, soon as practicable, any portion of the sum to which the United States might in the end be found entitled; and that the bank has notwithstanding delayed to make any such payment, though the agents of the Department considered that a large sum, amounting to some millions of dollars, was both just and proper to be paid before the 1st of January last.

Another ground of regret expressed in the memorial, and of apparent complaint, is, that a copy of the report of the agents of this Department was not furnished to the bank chartered by Pennsylvania before it was submitted to Congress; intimating that, in such event, that bank would have "instantly and cheerfully acceded" to the wishes of the Government, as explained by this Department.

How well-founded any complaint may be on that ground can with ease be ascertained, since it appears, by the documents annexed to the above-named report, that, on the request of this Department to the Bank of the United States chartered by Congress, to appoint a committee to unite with ours for the purpose of endeavoring to bring about an arrangement of the claim in question, a committee was appointed by that bank, in conjunction with the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania. This last committee, it seems, conferred and corresponded with ours freely and frequently during the whole inquiry. The grounds of difference were fully discussed and explained; and, after all reasonable efforts had failed to bring about an agreement upon terms mutually acceptable, then, and not till then, did our agents make a separate report. A full statement of all these proceedings appears in that report and the accompanying correspondence. Yet now it would seem that the president of the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania regrets a copy of the report was not transmitted to that bank, to show the views of the committee, before it was sent to Congress; though these views had been fully and explicitly developed while at Philadelphia to the joint committee of that bank and the bank chartered by Congress. He further asserts that, if the views of our committee had been made known to his bank, the terms expressed by them to be proper would have been "instantly and cheerfully acceded to," though his own committee distinctly refused to accede to them; and his bank, to which they probably reported in full, has never signified, until this memorial, any inclination to differ from the grounds before assumed by its committee, or to accede to what they, acting in its behalf, had deliberately and distinctly declined.

Claim of United States on U. S. Bank.

But it is a source of much satisfaction to this Department now to learn that, after more mature deliberation, one of the banks in behalf of which that committee acted has determined to accept the terms recommended by our agents as to the valuation of the shares, and has thus given a sanction to the correctness of their course in making and insisting on a much higher estimate of the value of the shares of the United States than the first or the second committee of the bank were willing to adopt.

The other subject referred to in the memorial, viz: the damages upon the bill of exchange drawn on the French Government, and the dividends sequestered and withheld upon that pretension, has been heretofore so fully discussed that I forbear now to enter at all into the consideration of its merits. But it is a matter of some surprise that the authority or course adopted by this Department in attempting to make an adjustment on that subject, under the act of June last, should appear to be impugned by the memorial, on the ground that the power conferred by the act did not warrant its proceedings. The power extends to the settlement and adjustment of the "capital stock" and "surplus profits." But it is to be observed that the dividends withheld on account of the damages claimed by the bank chartered by Congress had been carried to the profit and loss account, as was stated by the committee of the banks, or in effect had been added to the amount of surplus profits, and now constitute a part of those surplus profits. Is it not, therefore, obvious, that before the whole amount of surplus profits realized by the bank chartered by Congress can be correctly ascertained, and the value of the share of the United States in those profits settled, it should first be determined, if possible, whether the bank shall retain the whole of those dividends or not?

It therefore became proper to attempt the arrangement of that question in the first instance. Hence, in the instructions to the agents of this Department, they were requested to urge the bank to pay over the dividends withheld, except the sum equitably due to the bank for interest and any actual expenses incurred. But they were not directed, as represented in the memorial, to insist on that as a "preliminary" indispensable to the receipt of any portion of what was due, or indispensable to an agreement as to the value of the shares. Had the bank acceded to this request, the profits, now forming a part of the basis of a proposed arrangement, would then have been reduced to the extent of the difference, or probably about $160,000, and the share of the United States to about one fifth of those profits would have been estimated proportionably less. But, instead of receiving only one fifth of it as profits, they would have obtained, as dividends due, the whole of the other four fifths, being over $130,000 more, and which have so long been withheld from them by the bank.

Hence the agents very properly deemed it a "preliminary" question to settle, if practicable, how much of those dividends should be included among the profits, and accordingly used the language in their report, which is incorrectly attributed in the memorial to this Department. But though the committee of the bank declined paying over any of those dividends, and insisted on holding the whole as profits, this circumstance did not, as my instructions show, or as the course of the agents of the Treasury proves, prevent the agents from proceeding to make an examination, and to attempt an agreement as to what ought to be considered the true value of the shares. Neither of the committees regarded the failure to agree to pay any of the dividends as a preventive to an arrangement of the rest of the subject. They proceeded, therefore, to estimate that value on the basis assumed by the bank, that the whole of the dividends withheld were to be regarded as among the surplus profits, and the agents of the Department tried in vain to bring the committee of the bank, even on their own basis, to place an estimate on that value equal to what the bank now offers. So far, therefore, from any "menace," or any thing which common fairness could torture into an attack on "constitutional freedom," having, as the memorial intimates, been used in any of the communications from this Department connected with this attempt at an adjustment of any part of our claims, not the slightest pretence exists for the charge in the instructions on this point, the whole of which were as follows:

"4. It is further wished that, in forming an opinion of the value of the assets of the bank on the 3d of March, you should take into consideration the amount of dividends due to the United States which has been withheld and applied by the bank in payment of a claim for damages on the draft or order drawn by the Department on the French Government. Under all the circumstances of that case, this Department cannot recognise the right of the bank to any thing except the actual expenses incurred by it in consequence of the failure by the French Government to pay the draft, with the usual interest thereon, while the bank had not the use of the money, provided it did not have the use of it during the whole period till its formal repayment. For further particulars on this question, reference can be had to the printed opinions of the Attorney General, and the views of this Department in the annual reports to Congress, December, 1834. It would therefore seem proper, and it is submitted to your consideration, and that of any committee uniting with you on the part of the bank, whether the claim for constructive damages had not better be relinquished by the bank, and only a full indemnity for any actual loss be received, and the value of the stock be estimated on that basis—the bank, in the mean time, paying over the dividends to the United States which were withheld in 1834."

But though the agents of this Department properly proceeded to effect a future amicable adjustment, if possible, in full or in part, notwithstanding the refusal to pay the dividends withheld, yet they did this, not with a view of abandoning the claim of the Government for the whole of those dividends, after deducting any interest or actual expenses due; because it was a claim always insisted on by this Department as just, a claim so well sustained by equitable and legal principles, and a claim which had been so ably supported by the official opinions of the highest law officers of the Government. Nor can the Department now recommend to Congress any relinquishment or compromise of it. In respect to the right or propriety of the bank chartered by Pennsylvania to arraign the course of this Department on the present subject, even had it been so "unauthorized and unfortunate" as the memorial supposes, I shall not now stop to inquire, because Congress must be well aware that the signer of that memorial is not, and for near a year has not been, president of the United States Bank chartered by the General Government; that this Department has opened no correspondence with him or the State bank in respect to this claim and its settlement, but merely replied with courtesy to any communication he might choose to volunteer on the subject. The efforts of this Department have rather been directed to induce the Bank of the United States chartered by Congress, and its officers, to make a seasonable and just arrangement upon this embarrassing affair.

The United States own no stock in the bank in behalf of which this memorial has been presented to Congress; indeed, they are expressly excluded by the terms of its charter from any direct interest in it. Unless Congress may choose to release its claim upon the bank chartered by itself, and accept the bank chartered by the State of Pennsylvania as its debtor, either in the capacity of trustee or substitute, the United States have no immediate claim whatever upon the latter institution. The bank chartered by Congress is still in existence for the purpose of settling its affairs and paying over what is due to its stockholders.

It has a president and all other necessary officers, and it is for Congress to decide whether a new debtor—a new corporation, over which it possesses less legal control—shall be substituted for the bank originally chartered by its own authority, and which has not heretofore made, and does not now make, directly, any specific offer of payment or compromise.

But the corporation created by the State of Pennsylvania is represented to have become the trustee of that one chartered by Congress, and may be now acting in its behalf, though it never has become its trustee by the consent of the United States or of this Department. If regarded as amply able and safe for the fulfilment of any obligation it may enter into with regard to this claim, whether with or without collateral security, it would seem to be proper that authority should be given, by some law or joint resolution, to accept its obligations, under such limitations as sound prudence may dictate, considering the character of the institution and the great amount of the debt.

Without such authority, the Treasury Department would not of course feel justified in making any arrangement whatever with the State bank in question, or with its officers, in respect to this important claim, and by such "unauthorized" course to change the debtor of the Government, and perhaps lessen what Congress might consider its present legal security for eventual payment.

Whether the bank will or "will never differ with Congress about mere sums of money," and whether in respect to the French bill "the pecuniary interest involved was and is a matter of indifference" or not, after its two committees differed so much from the views of ours, and "the pecuniary interest involved" has been insisted on till now, and after its large contested claim to withhold the dividends was and is yet persisted in, though so manifestly inequitable, might have been deemed questionable but for the declarations in the memorial, which, it is hoped, may be happily successful in removing all future doubt or difficulty on those points. But should any misfortune, so much to be deprecated, prevent that desirable result, certain it is that the bank cannot be more anxious than this Department "to avert the hazard of any further mediation" connected with it, and to enable the president and directors of the institution chartered by Congress, at the earliest possible moment, "to terminate their connexion with the Government."

Respectfully, yours,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. SILAS WRIGHT,
Chairman of Committee on Finance of the Senate.

NOTES OF THE BANK OF THE U. STATES.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 22, 1837.

Mr. Galbraith, from the select committee to which the subject had been referred, made the following report:

The select committee, to which were referred certain memorials relative to an amendment of the constitution of the United States in relation to banking corporations in the States, and in relation to the reissues of the notes of the Bank of the United States, beg leave to report in part, viz: on that portion of the said memorials in relation to the reissues of the notes of the late Bank of the United States.

At the first meeting of the committee, the propriety of addressing a communication to the directors of the Bank of the United States chartered by Congress, with a view of ascertaining whether the notes of that institution, returned and redeemed since the 3d of March, had been reissued, and if so, to what extent, and of what denomination of notes, was suggested. The committee decided, with great unanimity, that such a course would be entirely useless and unavailable as to obtaining any information of the fact; that no information would be obtained of service in their investigation, or leading to any satisfactory result. That the committee should so unanimously come to this conclusion will not be matter of surprise, on a recurrence to the history of the conduct of the officers of that institution for the last few years. It may not be improper to refer to a few of these instances, furnishing a justification of such inference.

Passing over the concealment of matters from the committees of both Houses of Congress in 1832, and the exclusion of the directors appointed on the part of the Government from any participation in its transactions or knowledge of its affairs in 1833, a reference will be here made to other acts of a more recent date. In January, 1834, the officers of that institution refused to deliver over, on the order of the Secretary of War, the books, papers, and funds, connected with the disbursements to be made to the officers and soldiers of the revolutionary war, under the pension law of the 7th June, 1832. (See vol. 2. of Reports of Committees of the House of Representatives of 1833-'4, No. 263, and particularly the letter of its president, Mr. Biddle, of the 23d January, 1834, in which he reports the decision of the directors, distinctly refusing to comply with the order of the Secretary of War.) On the 4th of April, 1834, a resolution, reported by the Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives, was adopted by the House, providing for the appointment of a committee to investigate the affairs of the bank, under the 23d section of the act of Congress incorporating it, of the 10th April, 1816, which provides that "it shall, at all times, be lawful for a committee of either House of Congress, appointed for that purpose, to inspect the books and to examine into the proceedings of the corporation hereby created, and to report whether the provisions of this charter have been violated or not," &c. This committee was clothed with power to send for persons and papers, and proceeded to the banking-house in the city of Philadelphia, and resorted to every fair means to obtain the necessary information for the action of Congress; but the officers of the bank refused permission to the committee to inspect the books or examine its proceedings, and even refused to be sworn to give evidence on the subject, or furnish any information whatever, on the ground that they were not bound to criminate themselves; and entered into a system of special pleading in excuse, and boldly set at defiance the power and the rights of the people, through their representatives in Congress. (Vol. 4, Rep. of Com. H. Reps. 1833-'4, No. 481.) On the 13th July, 1834, the Secretary of the Treasury addressed a letter to the president of the bank, relative to the seizure and detention, by its officers, of the money in its possession belonging to the United States. To this letter no reply was given until the 28th of November, a period so late as to defeat an opportunity of that reply being submitted to the President of the United States in time for his remarks upon it, and the lawless and indefensible conduct of the officers of the bank in that act, in his annual message of that year. The high and aristocratic tone of that communication, made after four months' delay, manifests anything else than a disposition to furnish any satisfactory information, whenever it may not be the interest of the bank that it should be afforded. (Vol. 2, Ex. Doc. of 1834-'5, No. 21.) A similar tone plainly marks the conduct of the bank and its officers in the correspondence between its president and the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the branch drafts which had been illegally and unlawfully imposed upon the public by the bank. (Vol. 2, Ex. Doc. of 1834-'5, No. 42.) Again, on the 14th October, 1834, the President of the United States addressed a communication to the Government directors of the bank, requesting them "to report to him, with as little delay as possible, the gross profits made by the bank, of every description whatever, for each half year since the 1st January, 1832—the deductions in detail made from those profits,” &c.—in order that “he might be able to take a proper view of the subject of the public revenues in his communication to Congress.” After various fruitless efforts to examine the books of the bank, the Government directors were informed by the second assistant cashier (the cashier himself having kept out of the way) that the book they particularly desired was locked up in the vault, the key of which he then had in his pocket, but refused to deliver to them. (Vol. 2d, Ex. Doc. of 1834-'5, No. 45.)

The commissioners appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, in carrying out the provisions of the act of Congress of the 23d June last, to examine the affairs of the bank, on the 4th November, gave to the committee appointed on the part of the bank a memorandum of points on which they desired information, embracing, among other things, the only matter of which it would have been proper for your committee to seek information from the officers of the bank. The same evasive, technical, and unsatisfactory course was adopted by these officers which had heretofore distinctly characterized them. The points of that memorandum referred to are these: “What denomination of notes composed the nett circulation of the bank at that time?” (3d March, 1836.) “Have any of the notes of the bank been reissued since the 3d of March, 1836; and if so, to what amount?” To these points the committee on the part of the bank replied: “The denomination of the notes composing the nett circulation of the bank cannot be ascertained.” * * “The Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania has, it is understood, done as other banks have done, paid out the notes of the Bank of the United States; but of this the Bank of the United States has no official knowledge; nor has it any concern in the matter, as the new bank is bound to redeem all the notes of the old bank.”

With this continued history of systematic concealment, on the part of the bank, of all information from the Government and its officers, agents, and committees of Congress before them, your committee have deemed it vain and useless to seek for any satisfactory information on the subject to which their inquiry would necessarily lead, by opening a correspondence with the officers of the bank, if even they should ask and obtain power to send for persons and papers. Your committee have therefore entered upon the consideration of that branch of the subject relating to the reissue of the notes of the Bank of the United States since the expiration of its charter on the 3d of March last, to which their attention has been called by the memorials, with the best lights before them.

Although your committee cannot speak with official certainty in relation to the fact of the notes of the Bank of the United States, which had been returned to the bank and redeemed since the 3d of March last, having been reissued, and again thrown upon the community, or to what amount such reissues have taken place, yet it is believed there can exist no doubt of such having been the case, to the extent of almost the entire issues of the State bank of the same name since that period, and that no new issues have been made excepting a single emission of the denomination of ten dollars. The whole concurring testimony inevitably leads to that conclusion. It has been asserted over and over again, in the public prints, for more than nine months past; it was asserted on the floor of the House of Representatives, by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, as early as May or June last, on the authority of letters from a respectable source; gentlemen of the first respectability from the city of Philadelphia, the location of the bank, have spoken of it as a matter generally known and conceded; and it has never, as the committee have seen, been denied. It is also stated, by the commissioners appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the 21st September last, to investigate the claim of the Government upon the bank, after their investigation as far as permitted, in their communication to the Secretary of the 25th January last. (See Doc. No. 118, Ho. of Reps., of the present session.) They say at page 6 of that document, “the bank was not in fact closed when its charter terminated; no winding up of its business took place on the 3d of March; its accounts were carried on without interruption, previously and subsequently to that day; and its semi-annual settlement on the 1st of July, 1836, embraced the entire transactions from the 1st of January preceding; without reference to the change that had occurred in the mean time;” and they speak of the business of the bank being “blended with the affairs of the new institution,” “to which the books had been transferred,” &c. At page 14, speaking of the denomination of notes comprising the circulation, they say: “The fact that $10,142,038 had been redeemed in the interval which elapsed between the termination of the charter and the 12th of October afforded us no guide by which to form an opinion; because the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, and charged with the redemption of the circulation, continued during that time to pay out the notes originally issued by the Bank of the United States chartered by Congress.” From this testimony your committee believe, as before observed, there is no doubt of the existence of the fact of the reissues of the notes of the Bank of the United States, as suggested in the memorials; but it is claimed as a matter of right to reissue such notes since the expiration of the charter.

Your committee distinctly and unhesitatingly deny the existence of any such right, and proceed to examine the grounds on which it is claimed.

This claim of right is sought through an alleged charter, obtained from the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, by an act passed by that body on the 18th February, 1836, entitled “An act to repeal the State tax on real and personal property,” &c. The second section of that act provides that “the present stockholders of the Bank of the United States, excepting the United States and the Treasurer of the United States, and such other persons as may become stockholders, agreeably to the by-laws made for that purpose, to an amount not exceeding in the whole the present capital of the said bank, their successors and assigns, be, and are hereby, created a corporation and body politic, by the name and style of ‘the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States,’ and shall so continue until the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six,” &c. The stock of the United States, about $7,000,000, was thus excluded, by the terms of this State act, and the institution authorized to take in, by its by-laws, other stockholders instead of it, not to exceed the original amount of capital, $35,000,000. Shortly after this alleged act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania passed, an election was held by the individual stockholders, for directors of the Bank of the United States chartered by Congress; and another election, by the same stockholders, for directors of the same institution, as alleged to be continued by the State of Pennsylvania. On the 2d day of March, 1836, the day previous to the expiration of the charter granted by Congress, the directors of that institution, thus elected by the individual stockholders—the Government of the United States, although owning one fifth of the stock, having no participation in the election—transferred to the directors of the new or continued bank, a majority of them being the same men, all the funds of the institution, of every description, including, of course, all its notes, bills, property, &c., and the latter directors, for the new bank, assumed all the obligations of the bank chartered by Congress; in other words, the individual directors of the bank chartered by Congress, by the formal ceremony of a resolution of one board of directors elected by them, transferred to themselves, through another board, of nearly the same men, elected by them, adopting another resolution accepting the transfer, all the funds, shares, estate, property, &c., of the institution, assuming, by the latter resolution, all the obligations of the Bank of the United States chartered by Congress; thus virtually becoming its trustee, or assignee, voluntarily charged with all the obligations and duties incumbent upon the expiring institution.

The funds and property of the bank chartered by Congress, including its notes, its Government stock, moneys, effects, and estate, being thus transferred to the alleged new institution, constituting its entire stock and funds, on the accepted condition and voluntary assumption of discharging all the obligations and performing all the duties of the expiring bank, the whole matter is resolved to the single point of inquiry: What are the obligations and duties of the bank chartered by Congress, under its act of incorporation, after the 3d of March, 1836, the day on which it expired for all active business purposes, as clearly provided in the 7th section of the act of the 10th April, 1816? The 7th section fixes the termination of its active existence on the 3d of March, 1836; the 21st section provides that, "notwithstanding the expiration of the term for which the said corporation is created, it shall be lawful to use the corporate name, style, and capacity, for the purpose of suits, for the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation, and for the sale and disposition of their estate, real, personal, and mixed; but not for any other purpose, or in any other manner whatsoever, nor for a period exceeding two years after the expiration of the said term of incorporation." From the terms of this section, taken in connexion with those of the 7th, the intention of the act of Congress chartering the bank is too clearly expressed to be mistaken by any body; that, up to the 3d of March, 1836, it was enabled to perform all the functions for which it was created—such as discounting notes and bills of exchange, issuing and reissuing its notes, &c.; that after that period it could perform no act but such, and such alone, as should be necessary to the "liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation," and the sale and disposition of its property; the winding up of its concerns—such as calling in its bills in circulation, redeeming and cancelling them, collecting its debts, and settling with its creditors and stockholders. The reissuing of its notes is the same thing as the original issuing, and requires the exercise of precisely the same function—the performance of an active business duty—either employs the "name, style, and capacity," for another purpose, and in another manner, than that for the "final settlement and liquidation of the affairs," &c., and therefore clearly forbidden by the terms of the 21st section of the act. It is also indicated that this business of "the liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation" shall be performed within the limited period of two years—a period supposed to be sufficient to redeem all the paper in circulation, and collect all the debts due, and settle with all creditors. This could never be done if the redeemed notes of the bank should continue to be reissued as before the expiration of the charter. Indeed, it is contended by many, that those who happen to be the holders of the notes of that bank, after the expiration of the two years, (3d March, 1838,) could not recover the amount from the bank, construing the limitation of "suits" to apply to the capacity of being sued as well as suing. Your committee do not consider it necessary to decide that question; but the position is not without plausibility, inasmuch as the provision in the 21st section may be viewed as giving notice to the community, holding the notes, to return them within that period for redemption, or suffer the loss. If the construction be correct, it imposes the obligation so much the more strongly upon the institution, and indirectly upon Congress, to relieve the community from a description of circulation which may become dead and valueless in their hands. If it be a duty incumbent upon the bank chartered by Congress to redeem and cancel the notes returned since the expiration of the charter on the 3d March last, it is equally obligatory upon any individual or corporation, State or national, charged with the performance of its duties, to do the same thing. The position, therefore, that there is or can be a right any where to reissue the notes of the bank chartered by Congress, returned since the 3d of March last, and redeemed with the funds of that institution, either by its own officers directly or through the instrumentality of a trustee or assignee, your committee cannot but regard as both false and dishonest. That, on the contrary, such reissues are a cheat upon the community, a fraud upon the Government, and in direct contravention of the plain and undoubted intention of the act of Congress granting the charter.

To illustrate and simplify this, let us suppose a similar case of individuals. A and B enter into a partnership for the purpose of carrying on any particular business, say merchandising, for a certain period, and to terminate on a given day prescribed by their agreement. A vests in the concern $7,000, and B four times that sum, $28,000; and B assumes the management and control of the entire concern. It is agreed that, at the expiration of the time stipulated, the name and style of the firm shall be used for the purpose of suits for the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the partnership, but for no other purpose, nor in any other manner. B appoints as many clerks or agents as are necessary to conduct the affairs of the concern—they issue promissory notes, &c., in the name of the firm "A and B." The day previous to the expiration of the partnership, one of the clerks appointed by B, for the firm, transfers all the effects and funds of the firm to another of the clerks, for the use of B, he engaging to discharge all the obligations and duties, and pay all the debts due by the firm of A and B, and particularly the original stock due to A. After the expiration of the partnership, the business is continued by B. The notes of the firm are presented, paid out of the funds of the partnership, and reissued by the clerks of B, under his direction, thus rendering the funds of the partnership again liable for their payment; and besides, B refuses to settle or pay over to A the amount of his stock invested. Who would have the hardihood to defend this as an honest transaction, either towards the other partner or the community, upon whom the notes of the firm were thus thrown, after being redeemed out of the funds of the partnership? The individual who would attempt such a transaction could not sustain a character in any commercial community where character is regarded. If it did not constitute a forgery, so that he might be indicted for that crime, yet it would approach near to it, and probably constitute the crime of "cheating with false pretences." It would, at all events, justly stamp such individual with infamy in any correct community, as entirely unworthy of all trust or confidence. Is the same thing less unjust or fraudulent because committed by a corporation? The right to reissue the notes of the Bank of the United States, returned since the 3d March, is just the right, and no other, that any one has for the commission of a glaring and palpable fraud. It cannot be derived through the transfer from the directors of the old bank, made on the 2d March, 1836, to the directors of the alleged new bank, representing precisely the same stockholders, as its last will and testament, because they possessed no such right to transfer; but, on the contrary, were bound by the terms of the charter to settle and wind up the affairs after the 3d of March, or, in other words, were forbidden to issue or reissue their notes after that period. The directors of the old bank, not having any right to issue notes, could transfer no right to their assignee. It cannot be derived through the charter granted by the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, because, first, the act of Assembly of that State does not profess to vest any power in the bank to re-issue the notes of the old bank; and because, secondly, if it did, it would, so far, be absolutely null and void, being in express contravention of the act of Congress. It is not the purpose or within the duty of the committee to inquire into the manner and means by which the charter was obtained from the State, or into its provisions; but it may not be out of the way here to remark that, so far from the Pennsylvania act authorizing the bank to reissue the notes of the Bank of the United States chartered by Congress, it interdicts a large portion of such reissues as have taken place since the 3d of March last. The 6th article of the 4th section of the act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania provides: "And the notes and bills which shall be issued by order of said corporation, or under its authority, shall be binding upon it, and those made payable to order shall be assignable by endorsement, but none shall be issued of a less denomination than ten dollars." Now, inasmuch as the notes of the old bank constituted nearly the entire issues of the bank professed to be chartered by the State, and a large portion of those issues consisted of notes of a less denomination than ten dollars, such issues were not only in contravention of the act of Congress, but in direct and gross violation of the very act of the State Legislature through which the right of reissuing those notes is claimed for it. In the reply of the committee of the bank, before quoted, they say: "The Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania has, it is understood, done as other banks have done—paid out the notes of the Bank of the United States;" placing that bank on the same footing with others receiving the notes of the old bank in the course of their own regular business. The error committed here is too glaring and manifest to be attributed to mere misconception or misapprehension of the relation in which the Bank of the United States, chartered by the State, stands both with regard to the old bank and the Government. That a bank or an individual, receiving the notes of the bank which had expired on the 3d of March, in the ordinary course of their own business, might pay them out again in the same way, no one would pretend to deny; but what child does not at once perceive the different position occupied by that institution, and that occupied by all other institutions and individuals, both with regard to the Government of the United States and the Bank of the United States chartered by Congress, in this particular? If they receive such notes, they receive them as their own, and on their own account; the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, receiving the Government stock and moneys belonging to the United States, and all the funds of the bank chartered by Congress, is placed in possession of its notes, under a special trust to discharge all the obligations of the old bank, one of which is to wind up its affairs, or, in other words, not to reissue its notes; and it cannot reissue them but in violation of that trust.

The committee having, as they believe, satisfactorily shown that the notes of the Bank of the United States chartered by Congress, returned and redeemed from the funds of that institution since the expiration of its charter, have been since reissued and put again into circulation, and that such reissuing is without right, fully sustaining the views of the memorialists, it remains to inquire into the mischief, and the power of Congress to provide a remedy, and what remedy is most proper and appropriate.

One of the mischiefs arising from this reissuing of notes, once redeemed from the source upon the responsibility of which they were originally issued, is the deception practised upon an unwary community. It is true they are not strictly counterfeit notes, being genuine in point of form, signed by the persons whose signatures they bear, and originally what they purport on their face, but spurious in substance, having been once redeemed from the basis originally liable for their redemption, and that basis removed and transferred to another corporation, created by State legislation, which may or may not redeem them, at the pleasure of its officers, or as their interests may determine; and after the 3d of March, 1838, beyond which they will of course continue to circulate, if continued to be reissued, still rendered more doubtful of payment by the additional legal obstacle interposed to their recovery, should payment be refused. It may be said, however, that the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, to which the funds and property of the Bank of the United States have been entirely transferred, has undertaken to pay all debts due from it, and to discharge all its obligations. But to whom is that undertaking made? Not to the holders of the notes. There is no privity between them and the new corporation; and, on the presentation of such notes to its officers, they might reply, without a greater violation of obligation than they have often before committed: "It is true we had undertaken to discharge the debts of the bank chartered by Congress, but that was only an arrangement for our own convenience among ourselves, and we have already redeemed more of its notes than the amount of funds received from that source, and we cannot redeem any more;" and, in the complicated state of its affairs, it would be hopeless for any one to show to the contrary; and if he could, the cost might overrun the recovery, to say nothing of the delay and disappointment. A new and a different responsibility from that expressed on the face of the notes is substituted, without the holder's consent, and not necessarily within his knowledge, which may or may not turn out insolvent, which is unjust to the country.

The example is calculated to have a pernicious effect upon the commercial community. If a trick of this kind, practised by the officers of the bank, should pass unnoticed and unpunished, others, even less honest, may be tempted to even greater outrages upon commercial fairness and integrity, until all commercial confidence be destroyed.

The stock of the Government of the United States in the bank, estimated by a committee of the individual stockholders themselves at $7,583,698 59, and by the commissioners appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury at $8,110,215 09—the money of the people of this country—is withheld from them, and placed, without their consent, at the disposal of a few bank directors, in whose selection they have no participation—to be wasted or speculated upon, at the pleasure of bank officers, of whom the people know nothing. The people's money is thus seized upon and detained for the purpose of redeeming notes over and over again, reissued in violation of law and obligations voluntarily assumed. Had this sum been paid over to the United States, or even half of it, a large increase would have been made to the amount deposited with the different States, to be applied to the purposes of the country, under the deposit act of June last. Without expressing any opinion here of the policy of that act, your committee deem it their duty to assert the right of the Government, under the control of the people, to the possession of what is due to it, to make such disposition of it as the people may direct, without the hindrance or obstruction of any board of bank directors. It may be said that the Government have a security, in the obligation of the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, for the payment of its shares in the stock of the Bank of the United States chartered by Congress. Your committee reply, that this undertaking is not given directly to the Government; and if it were, there is a difference between obligation and payment; and in the instance under consideration, that difference may be very important. It appears by the report of the commissioners appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, already referred to, that on the 3d of March last the bank stood as follows: Notes in circulation, $12,109,352 23; specie, $5,595,077 25: and by the return made to the Auditor General of the State of Pennsylvania, by the bank chartered by that State, in November following, it stood thus: notes in circulation, $9,733,032 28; specie, $3,275,292 36: being reduced nearly one half in specie and more in circulation, although it had in the mean time contracted a loan in Europe of $6,788,194 44, and its liabilities equal to its entire resources. Since that time it has still further dwindled down in specie and in business; and should the redeemed notes of the expired corporation continue to be reissued, as they have been, in a few months the whole resources out of which the claim of the Government ought to have been paid must be abstracted, and an entirely different responsibility substituted, and one of a very doubtful character.

In proposing remedies against the mischiefs here adverted to, we are met with the objection that the reissues have been made by the bank chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, which, being a State institution, is beyond any control or legislative action by Congress. Your committee concede, to the full extent, that Congress possesses no power to legislate directly over institutions purely of a State character, and unconnected with the Government of the United States. The answer, however, is, that a remedy may be provided without interfering with the relations between the Government of the United States and the State institutions, further than has been done heretofore without objections. Congress has heretofore directed the description of circulation which should be received in payment of public dues, regulated the deposit of the public money in State banks, and passed other acts which, in their operation, affected indirectly more or less the institutions incorporated by the States. But again, the Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, as already seen, has connected itself with this Government more intimately than any other institution of the kind, having, without the request or consent of the Government, taken possession of more than $8,000,000 belonging to the people of the United States, and added it to its own stock, and voluntarily assumed the payment to the Government of the United States, but has refused to pay it or to settle the amount, and continues to reissue the notes of the Bank of the United States in which the Government was a stockholder, and for the redemption of which notes the money of the Government in its hands is liable. Its relation to the Government, therefore, is peculiar, and of its own seeking; being a voluntary and unsought depository of the public money, and placed in possession of the funds in which the Government have an interest, and thus by its own act brought within the legitimate control of Congress.

Your committee believe it to be not only the right but the duty of Congress to protect the community from the deception of a circulation spurious in its character, bearing the authority of the United States, being the same, in effect, as counterfeit paper. By directing that such circulation shall not enter into the collection of the public revenues, it is believed a large portion of it will be thrown out of the circulation of the country, and its true character made generally known. By this means, the intention of the act of Congress, that all the notes of the Bank of the United States should be called in and redeemed within the two years after the expiration of its charter, may be at least in part carried into effect.

With this view, they propose a joint resolution for the adoption of the House, excluding such notes from circulation, so far as regards the collection of the public revenues. Your committee are also fully satisfied of the power of Congress to render penal any future act violating the provisions of an act of Congress, and having a mischievous tendency upon the currency of the country, calculated to destroy or lessen the funds of the Government, or weaken the securities for the collection of the public revenues, or to deceive and impose upon the people of the United States; and, under this view of the matter, beg leave to report a bill providing for the punishment of the reissuing the notes of the Bank of the United States once redeemed, by those in whose possession they are after redemption, and who are charged, by their own assumption, with their payment.

Joint resolution relative to the notes of the Bank of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That until the notes of the late Bank of the United States which may have been returned since the third day of March last, and redeemed out of the funds of the said bank, shall have ceased to be reissued by its officers, directors, trustee or trustees, and until the amount due to the Government from said bank shall be settled to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, the notes of said bank, and the notes of any bank to which its funds and estate may have been transferred in trust for the payment of its debts and the discharge of its duties and obligations, shall not be received in payment of any debts due to the Government of the United States, or taken in exchange or on deposit in any of the banks selected as depositories of the public money; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to carry this provision into effect.

A bill providing for the punishment of reissuing the notes of the late Bank of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if any officer of the Bank of the United States shall reissue, or cause or permit to be reissued, any note or notes of the said bank which had been redeemed at the said bank, or the trustee or assignee of said bank, out of the funds belonging thereto, since the third of March last, it shall be deemed a misdemeanor; and, on conviction thereof in any district or circuit court of the United States, the offender shall pay a fine of one thousand dollars; the one half thereof to the use of any person who shall prosecute the same, and the other half to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

BANKING COMPANIES.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 3, 1837.

Mr. Galbraith, from the select committee to which the subject had been referred, made the following report:

The select committee to which were referred certain memorials suggesting an amendment of the constitution of the United States in relation to banking companies, and against the reissuing of the notes of the United States Bank, beg leave to make their final report:

At the time of the adoption of the constitution of the United States, there were but three banks in all the States, with a capital, in all, of $4,550,000: the Bank of North America, in Philadelphia, with a capital of $2,000,000, first chartered by the old Congress in 1781, and afterwards by the Legislatures of Pennsylvania and New York; the Massachusetts Bank, at Boston, chartered by the Legislature of Massachusetts in 1784, with a capital of $1,600,000; and the Bank of New York, chartered the same year, with a capital of $950,000. This constituted the whole banking capital of the United States at that time. The framers of the constitution, therefore, had but little knowledge of a banking system, such as it now is in this country. It could scarcely be expected that they could have anticipated that, within half a century, there could be eight hundred and twenty-three banks, with a capital of $378,421,168. Such an anticipation would have required a revival of the spirit of prophecy. They had experienced the fatal effects of the provincial paper money, and the no less pernicious results of the continental paper, and provided, as they supposed, in the constitution, against both: against the former, by providing in the 10th section of the 1st article that "no State shall emit bills of credit, make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts;" against the latter, by nowhere giving to Congress the power of creating a paper circulation. It is matter of history, that the old Congress of 1776 had emitted continental paper to carry on the war, by a majority of its members, until the adoption of the articles of confederation in 1778, in which it was provided, among other things, that Congress should not "emit bills, nor borrow money on the credit of the United States, &c., unless nine States should assent to the same." It is very probable that the small amount of bank issues at that time attracted very little attention, particularly as specie was very abundant for some time after the revolutionary struggle: the French and English armies at New York and other places, the foreign loans, and the Havana trade, having introduced great quantities of the precious metals into this country. With the provisions, therefore, that "no State should emit bills of credit, make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts;" and that Congress should have the power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures;" and the silent negation of power to Congress to emit bills of credit, the framers of the constitution, no doubt, supposed they had thrown an ample guard around the currency of the country, and secured the poor and industrious from the pestilential effects of a paper-money system, and the curses of the speculations and frauds which follow it. Such appears to have been the sentiment of political writers of that day. We shall content ourselves here with one quotation from Mr. Madison, than whom no one was better qualified to expound the intention of that invaluable instrument. In the forty-fourth number of the Federalist, speaking of the clause of the constitution providing that "no State shall emit bills of credit," &c., he says:

"The extension of the proposition to bills of credit must give pleasure to every citizen, in proportion to his love of justice, and his knowledge of the true springs of public prosperity. The loss which America has sustained since the peace, from the pestilential effects of paper money on the necessary confidence between man and man; on the necessary confidence in the public councils; on the industry and morals of the people; and on the character of republican government, constitutes an enormous debt against the States chargeable with this unadvised measure, which must long remain unsatisfied; or, rather, an accumulation of guilt which can be expiated no otherwise than by a voluntary sacrifice on the altar of justice of the power which has been the instrument of it. In addition to these persuasive considerations, it may be observed, that the same reasons which show the necessity of denying to the States the power of regulating coin, prove with equal force that they ought not to be at liberty to substitute a paper medium in the place of coin. Had every State a right to regulate the value of its coin, there might be as many different currencies as States, and thus the intercourse between them would be impeded; retrospective alterations in its value might be made, and thus the citizens of other States be injured, and animosities be kindled among the States themselves. The subjects of foreign Powers might suffer from the same course, and hence the Union be discredited and embroiled by the indiscretion of a single member. No one of these mischiefs is less incident to a power in the States to emit paper money than to coin gold and silver. The power to make any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts, is withdrawn from the States on the same principles with that of issuing a paper currency."

But whatever may have been the intention of our political patriarchs in framing the constitution, or their deep-felt regrets in seeing what they supposed its spirit departed from, in the multiplication of banks, and the unexpected deluge of nominal paper money; a paper system has become too firmly settled in almost all the States of the Union to have the most remote prospect of relief from it, but in a radical change of the fundamental instrument of compact by which the States are bound together. However ardent they may have been in their efforts to fix the impression upon their posterity, and those who came to administer the Government after them, that the precious metals should constitute the only constitutional currency of this highly favored country, which should preserve the sound principles of equality to all its citizens, by establishing a "hard-money Government;" yet, through a variety of brilliant schemes and projects, apparently for the promotion of favorite objects of improvement, and the untiring activity of those who found it easier to live upon the industry of others than to labor themselves, we have found a paper system grown by progressive steps to its present enormous and appalling extent of nearly $400,000,000 of banking capital authorized by the Legislatures of the several States. In the various stages of its progressive increase, we have occasionally heard the voice of some disinterested and patriotic statesman, in the simple eloquence of political truth, exclaim against it as an encroachment upon the equal rights of man; as rapidly building up a mushroom aristocracy in the country, of a most dangerous and destructive character, and bearing down the most dear and sacred principles of our republican fabric; but it has as often been hushed and stifled by the more noisy and zealous clamors of interested projectors and speculators, who could see their own immediate and pecuniary interests involved, and likely to be swept away by the destruction of their darling monopolies. The paper system, through the instrumentality of soulless and irresponsible corporations, notwithstanding repeated fluctuations, panics, bankruptcies, and ruin, clearly traceable to it as the prime cause, has still grown up and extended, until we find it what it now is. What the States were bound, or rather what they had solemnly agreed, not to do directly, has been done indirectly, by the surrender of a high sovereign power to incorporated companies, by vesting them with exclusive privileges of banking.

The system of banking by companies incorporated by the State Legislatures, as they now exist in this country, blended as it has become, and interwoven with all the business and transactions of society, and reaching the personal interests of every individual in community, from the humble day-laborer to the most extensive wholesale merchant, is extremely complicated and difficult to understand in all its various ramifications. Its intricacy and complexity is such as to call in requisition the closest scrutiny and investigation of the skillful political economist; and its general and universal operation upon all branches of industry demands from every citizen who regards his own interests, the equality of rights, and the spirit of our republican institutions, or the liberties of this country, his undivided attention and coolest and most serious reflection.

Your committee do not profess an intimate acquaintance with all the minute intricacies of the banking system, or the complicated machinery of corporate privileges, or the usurpations, assumption, and arrogance, the corruptions and oppressions of incorporated companies. They propose, however, with what lights they possess, and with as much reflection as they have been able to bestow upon it, consistent with their other duties, entering briefly into the consideration of the subject submitted to them in the memorials, under the following heads of inquiry:

First. What is money, its use, and essential properties?

Second. What is the banking system as it now exists in the several States of this Union? What its nature, history, and effects upon the various transactions of society?

Third. What remedy may be provided against its evil consequences?

As preliminary to and closely connected with the subject more immediately submitted in the memorials, we take up the first inquiry proposed, viz :

What is money, its use, and essential properties?

Money is the standard of value established by law; the sign or medium of price by which labor and products are estimated, products and commodities exchanged, and contracts fulfilled. It is an essential part of the machinery of civilized society; without which, commodities in their complicated varieties could not be compared with each other as to value. Dr. Adam Smith, in his Wealth of Nations, vol. 1, book 1, page 44, says: "In all civilized nations, money has become the universal instrument of commerce; by the intervention of which, goods of all kinds are bought and sold, or exchanged for one another." Hume, in his Essays on Money, vol. 1, page 299, (Edinburgh edition,) says: "Money is not, properly speaking, one of the subjects of commerce, but only the instrument which men have agreed upon to facilitate the exchange of one commodity for another. It is not one of the wheels of trade: it is the oil which renders the motion of the wheels more smooth and easy."

It would be a tedious labor, and answer no valuable practical purpose, to inquire into the origin of money, or what led mankind first to adopt a common instrument of value; and perhaps the result of such an investigation would be extremely uncertain. We may imagine a state of barbarism, and probably might trace it, when the transactions of men were so rude and simple as to be purely subjects of first occupancy and barter. Such an inquiry might be interesting to the curious, and arrest the attention of the philosophic antiquarian, but could serve little purpose to the practical statesman of the present age in our country. That different commodities have been employed by different nations, as media of exchange, at different periods, we have from authentic history. Oxen were used among the Greeks; bulls in India; salt in Abyssinia; tobacco in Virginia; sugar in some of the West India islands; iron in Sparta; and copper among the Romans. Corn, leather, and cocoa, have each, in their turn, served as the selected commodity to determine the value of all others. Silver and gold have been adopted by most civilized commercial nations as the most convenient commodities to serve as money, or the measure of value. They were first used in bars or bullion, and required weighing or assaying, which interposed an inconvenience. To avoid this, and to accommodate it to the exchanges, in process of improvement, civilized Governments directed the coinage of the precious metals by dividing them into convenient fractional parts or quantities, and stamping it in such a manner as to denote the quantity or denomination of such parts. Until public authority, by its stamp, confers upon the precious metals the character of coin, it is not legal money, however valuable they may be intrinsically as an article of merchandise. Nor can public authority add to or diminish their value; it only fits them better as a medium of exchange. As Mr. Ganible says, "the monetary law is simply declaratory of the fact," (the value.) Silver has been more generally adopted as money than gold, owing to the too great scarcity of the latter metal to serve the purpose. Gold was not used but as an article of merchandise in England, until 1723. The United States have adopted both as standards of value.

The reasons why improved and civilized Governments have adopted gold and silver as the preferred commodities, to measure the value of all others, are very obvious. They are more appropriate and suitable than any other articles. They are easily divisible into small fractions, and as easily united without loss. Their quantity is the least susceptible of increase or diminution, and, therefore, the least liable to fluctuation—a most important property for money, as we shall explain more fully hereafter. They are of the same quality in all countries and under all circumstances, which is not the case with any other metals. Iron, for example, is of very different quality, even in the same neighborhood; and copper is much finer and heavier in some countries than in others. They are both fusible and malleable, so as to be capable of being united with sufficient convenience, and receive the stamp or certificate of the Government designating the weight and purity of the particular piece; and, at the same time, sufficiently hard to prevent the obliteration of the sign that is stamped upon them, though freely circulated.

The material of which money is formed must possess intrinsic value. The stamp, or certificate that such a piece contains a certain quantity of that material, of such a quality, so that the people may confide in it without the inconvenience of weighing or assaying it, is the attribute of sovereignty alone. It is most appropriately so when the Government is republican, framed and controlled by the people themselves, and those who administer it are immediately responsible to them. The power to impress this stamp, or certificate of quantity or quality of the material, designating its value, can never be lodged safely any where, so as to secure the confidence of the people as an instrument of value, but in the Government; and least of all can it be safely intrusted to corporations not created by, nor under the control of, the people, and whose officers are placed under no responsibility to the people, either moral, political, or pecuniary. Although it is necessary that Government should stamp some device upon the metal, in order to designate the quantity and purity of the coin, and thus fit it as an instrument of exchange, no absolute value is thus imparted to it. That it possessed before, else it could not serve as a measure of value. Mr. Raymond, in his Elements of Political Economy, volume 1, page 234, adds his own opinion in support of Mr. Reed, whom he quotes, thus: "Money has two distinct functions to perform; the one is that of a measure of value, the other an instrument of exchange. Those different functions, though intimately and inseparably connected and blended together in practice, are perfectly separate and distinct in their own nature; and the qualities likewise requisite in the material substance of which money is composed, necessary to fit it for the proper performance of each of those functions, are distinct and different.

"To be capable of performing the function of a measure of value, money must have value in itself, and inseparable from it, to the full amount of that for which it passes current. To be adequate to officiate as an instrument of exchange, it is sufficient that it be the representative of that which has value. For the former purpose, gold or silver, or some substance possessing similar qualities, is indispensable. For the latter, paper, or any article conveniently portable, on which can be marked an engagement or obligation, rendering it the representative of that which has value, may be sufficient. But paper never measures value. It acts merely as an instrument of exchange. It is merely the representative of that which measures. Its own value must be measured and defined. It depends for the definition, or measure of its own value, totally on that of which it is no more than the representative or sign. Nor can it be dependent upon, when separated and disconnected from that which it represents, to continue the same for the shortest period.

"It is necessary, therefore, to have a money of quite a different description from paper, to act in the capacity of a measure of value, and to fix, determine, and define, the value of paper, and every other money which circulates at a greater value than it is intrinsically worth.

"A measure having neither length, nor breadth, nor thickness, could not measure those qualities of matter. A measure having no weight could never measure the weight of bodies; neither can a measure having no value measure their value. Money, as a measure, is not different from measures of other kinds. A measure of length must have length; a measure of weight must have weight; and a measure of value must have value.

"If it be necessary to define and fix precisely the measure of length—as an inch, a foot, a yard; and the measure of weight, as a grain, a pennyweight, an ounce, a pound—so it is equally necessary to define and fix precisely the measure of value, as a shilling, a guinea, a pound sterling." Mr. Raymond, at page 236 of the same book, proceeds: "The value of a piece of coin depends on the quantity of metal it contains, and not on the device with which it is stamped." Mr. Gouge, in his excellent treatise on the Principles of the American Banking System, at page 9, holds the same sentiment: "The precious metals do not differ essentially from other items of wealth. This is distinctly seen when they are in the form of bullion. Converting them into coin does not change their nature. It only adapts them to a particular use; fits them for passing from hand to hand, without the trouble of weighing or assaying each piece at each transfer." Again he says: "Some fancy that it is the authority of Government that gives money its value. But the true value of money, as measured by the amount of goods for which it will honestly exchange, cannot be affected by edicts of princes or acts of Parliament. Monarchs and ministers may alter the weight of coins, or lessen their purity; but they cannot make a coin containing one half of an ounce of pure silver worth as much as a coin containing an ounce. The stamp of the State is a mere certificate of the weight and fineness of the piece."

It follows from those premises, that money being necessarily a measure of value, as well as an instrument of exchange, without increasing the quantity of value, its real and actual quantity cannot be increased. It is true that it may be numerically or nominally increased; the volume of the circulating medium may be enlarged by adulteration of the metals themselves, or the emission of something else in their place; yet the quantity of real pure money remains the same; and just as much as it has increased in quantity it has diminished in quality, and will measure no more value than it did before the infusion of alloy, or other valueless matter, into its mass.

It is also true that a measure of value is, in its very nature, somewhat more imperfect than that of either weight or measure, and even gold and silver are not entirely free from this imperfection; but the variations to which they are subject are so trifling and inconsiderable as not to be perceptible in the practical affairs of life; at least, they are infinitely the nearest perfection of any commodity that has yet been discovered.

Any change in the relative proportion between money and other commodities, by an artificial increase of quantity without an increase of value, will necessarily produce a change of price. If the quantity of money be nominally increased, the price of property to be measured by it rises; the depreciation of money and the rise of price being precisely the same thing. If the value of what is called a dollar be lessened by the infusion of alloy, or the enlargement of the mass of which it is a fractional part, it will require a greater number of dollars to measure the value of a horse, or other commodity, just as it will require a greater number of the measure of length called a foot, when shortened, to measure the length of a piece of cloth. All attempts, therefore, on the part of Government, to tamper with the monetary system, by increasing its quantity without increasing the value, are not only useless, but unjust and pernicious, and have always been found so, whenever the experiment has been tried.

Mr. Raymond says, at page 237 of the volume before quoted, "It seems to have been a prevailing opinion, even down to the present time, that the quantity of money could be increased by various expedients, without increasing the actual quantity of value. Hence, in the earlier periods of civilization, the denomination of the coin was frequently changed, for the purpose of increasing the quantity and plentiness of money. In some cases the coin has been adulterated with a baser metal, while its nominal value was retained, for the same purpose. In modern times, a more refined method of adulteration and deception has been practised, with better success as to accomplishing a fraud on the public, but with no better success as to increasing the quantity of actual value. Instead of using a baser metal for alloy, and incorporating it with the precious metals by a coinage, a quantity of paper, purporting to be money, has been infused into the volume or mass of circulating medium; and in that way the nominal quantity of money has been increased, without any increase of the quantity of value."

When $100,000 of specie or coin constitutes the circulating medium of a community, that $100,000 measures the value of all the property in that community. If the Legislature then resort to the expedient of increasing the quantity of the circulating medium, by directing twice the quantity of alloy to be infused into this medium, and the mixed mass to be coined in the same way, still calling it so many dollars, or by emitting 200,000 nominal paper dollars, to pass into the circulation with the specie, and obliging the citizens to take it in all contracts and exchanges, three dollars then will measure just as much property as one did before the resort to this unskillful expedient; and the man who had sold his land or other property for the price of $100, is paid in the depreciated medium, and cheated out of two thirds of his honest debt. On the other hand, the man who buys when the mass of circulation is thus enlarged, and before pay-day the Legislature withdraws the alloy or abolishes the paper dollars, pays just three times as much as he had agreed to pay.

Your committee have, perhaps, been somewhat tedious on this branch of the subject involved in the inquiry proposed; yet, as they have regarded the first and fundamental distinction in the properties of money, between the quantity of the medium and the quantity of value, of great importance—a distinction between money and its supposed representative, often very imperfectly understood, and the confounding or overlooking of which has, perhaps, produced more mischiefs upon communities than all other errors in political economy besides—they have thought proper to be thus minute in relation to it.

It is bad enough when Government undertakes directly, by its own legislation, to destroy the distinction between money and its essential properties as a measure of the value of other commodities; still, while legislators, amenable to the people, choose to exercise such power, their proceedings are public, and must be known, and are the subject of animadversion and discussion, and the citizens have some opportunity of anticipating the result, and preparing for it; but when that power is surrendered to corporations, whose proceedings are secret, and whose officers are no way answerable to the people, it becomes infinitely more pernicious and unjust.

This leads to the second head of inquiry: What is the banking system, as it now exists in the several States of this Union? What its nature, history, and effects upon the various transactions of society?

The banking system, as it now exists in this country, is a machinery of no ordinary complexity and magnitude.

Few subjects are less generally understood; and, at the same time, few, if any, in the scale of political existence, affect more closely the interests of every man in society.

The banking business in America is performed almost entirely by companies incorporated for the purpose by the Legislatures of the several States. These banking companies are not merely offices of loan and deposit; they are also offices of discount and banks of circulation, or manufacturers of paper money; that is, they are not merely authorized to loan what money they actually have, at the legal rate of interest, and to undertake the safe keeping of money for a reasonable per centage for their risk and trouble, but they are also authorized to discount notes of those who wish to borrow, and manufacture paper money to the amount of twice or thrice the amount of money they really possess. They are permitted, in fact, to supply with their own paper the circulating medium of the country, and to drive the constitutional currency out of circulation; and thus swell the volume of nominal money, and, just in the same proportion as they enlarge the mass, decrease the value of the whole.

The banking institutions of this country are thus seen to possess a combination of four several functions, viz: to loan money, to receive money on deposit, to discount notes and bills of exchange, and to manufacture paper money for circulation, stamping upon it the signs of value corresponding in denomination with the legal coins of the country; and, for the exercise of all these functions combined, they enjoy exclusive chartered privileges, without individual responsibility. As a loan office, or a depository, a bank, well conducted upon substantial capital, may be not only harmless, but even useful and convenient; and, as an office of discount merely, it can do but little mischief. Many, indeed, have confounded the function of a loan office with that of an office of discount. There is a slight difference. In the former case, the bank is the direct creditor; in the latter, it acts rather in the capacity of a collector. A merchant who holds the promissory note or bill of exchange of a third person, payable at a certain day, throws it into bank for collection, endorses it, and the bank discounts it, according to the time the note or bill has to run, and gives the merchant the amount, deducting the discount. In this case it performs the functions of an office of discount, and acts as a collector. If a merchant wishes to obtain a loan, he makes his own note, with an endorser, and puts it into bank, and the bank pays him the amount, deducting the discount. The bank then becomes the direct creditor, and in this case acts as a loan office. In the exercise of neither of those three functions do the banking institutions affect materially the transactions of the society, or operate to the prejudice of others.* It is mainly in the capacity of paper-money manufacturers, combined with their functions of loan offices, with incorporated privileges, that they will be hereafter considered and treated.

As the object of the inquiry here is intended more to be addressed to those who are not intimately acquainted with the affairs of banking than for those who are well versed in all its details, in order to simplify the nature of such institutions, we will represent the principle on a small scale, and separated from the great variety of combined circumstances with which they are now surrounded, which conceal their effects. Suppose that a certain community contains a population of one hundred citizens, each producing his equal share of wealth and property by his industry, and each enjoying the benefits of what he produces, and no more; and there are no artificial laws or regulations by which one citizen is enabled to acquire, or have transferred to him, the property or acquisition of another, without an equivalent in what he had produced himself. Suppose there is in this little community a capital of real money of ten thousand dollars, which measures all the property within it, and serves as the common medium of exchange in the transfer and exchange of commodities, the payment of labor, &c.; and that its circulation is limited, as the business is within the community itself; no increase of the quantity of this circulating medium takes place without a corresponding change in the quantity of value; consequently, prices will be uniform, and always the same. In this state of society, every one acquires just in proportion to his industry and economy, whether farmer, mechanic, laborer, or whatever his profession may be; all is happiness and tranquillity; no extravagant or wild schemes are projected of making a splendid fortune in a short time, without labor or substantial enterprise; and every one knows what price he is to receive for what he has or what he does, and can calculate accordingly in confidence. But a few of those individuals—we will suppose ten—conceive the project of establishing a bank of circulation, urging, as an argument, that it would make money plentier, afford great facilities to trade and business, furnish a cheaper money, and more convenient, portable, &c., and such other arguments as we have often heard in favor of those institutions. They apply to their Legislature, and obtain a charter for a bank with a capital of ten thousand dollars, with the privilege of issuing notes for circulation to the amount of twice their capital; and all the rest of the individuals who do not become stockholders are prohibited, under penalties, from issuing their own paper. These ten subscribe the stock, and pay in the instalment required, say one hundred dollars each; they elect their officers; and the machine, thus fitted up, is ready to commence operations. Five of the stockholders themselves put in their notes to the bank for two thousand dollars each, making ten thousand dollars; and, aware of the effect they are about to produce throughout the society upon prices, go into the country and purchase up all the produce that is to spare at the then and heretofore steady and uniform prices; say wheat, at one dollar per bushel, paying for it in the notes of the new bank. In a very short time, it is seen and felt that money is becoming plenty; business becomes brisk and lively, and a new aspect is presented. Others begin to lay plans of speculation; and, for the purpose of carrying them out, go to the bank to borrow. Forty of the remaining individuals put in their notes for two hundred and fifty dollars each, (ten thousand dollars,) which are shaved by the bank at the rate of bank interest, six dollars and forty cents per cent. per annum, and receive the notes of the bank, paying no interest for circulation. Some go into speculation, and others to building houses or making other improvements; and each, feeling that he had obtained this money with so much more ease, by simply throwing a note into bank, and calculating that money, as they call it, was going to be still plentier than it had been; that the same bank which had made it so much plentier now could just as easily make it still more so; and its directors were very excellent men, and would certainly direct its energies for the benefit of the public, regard it very differently than they did when obtaining it only as they earned it; spend it more freely, and indulge in the purchase of articles they would not have purchased before, and venture to make improvements they did not before. Every thing assumes a new appearance; every description of business is active; prosperity seems to glisten in every sunbeam; every body praises the bank, and its projectors and managers are blessed as the greatest and wisest men of the age; the president, or the man who can be traced as the first inventor of this happy scheme of making money plenty out of paper, is treated to dinners, presented with the richest offerings that can be bestowed upon him, and he is looked up to with as much reverence as the feudal lords were formerly by their enslaved vassals. A feverish excitement seizes upon the whole community; a spirit of speculation is engendered; and many look upon the industrious pursuit of any mechanical business as too dull and slow to occupy their time and attention. It is time now, however, to trace the action of the stockholders who have purchased up the products. In the course of a short time after they are through with their purchases, the products must be in demand, there being none to be bought; and, as the volume of circulating medium has increased from ten to thirty thousand dollars, by the infusion of twenty thousand dollars of the issues of the bank, and no increase of the quantity of value, as certainly as water will flow down hill, or as any cause will produce its plainest and most obvious effect, (the money having depreciated in real value, though nominally the same,) property must appreciate or rise in price, compared with that money. At this stage they sell, which they are enabled to do at two or three dollars, what they purchased at one dollar, until they have disposed of all on hand, having made a splendid profit by the operation; and whatever they have cleared in profit, the loss to the same amount is a tax upon the rest of the society. They are now ready to commence the operation of "contraction." The borrowers are called upon for a per centage, perhaps twenty-five per cent. at every sixty days; and, as the circulation is decreased at every payment, being withdrawn for the purpose of paying the bank, every instalment becomes the more difficult to obtain. If only one borrower were called upon, it would not make any material difference, as his payments would have but little effect upon the general mass of circulation; but as all are called upon at the same time, the volume of circulating medium is rapidly decreasing, money becoming more scarce, and the means of obtaining it lessening. A great change takes place in the appearance and prospects of this little community; a general gloom has spread over the whole face of the country. Those who have borrowed direct all their energies in seeking for means to make payment; those who have kept their money during the season of apparent prosperity now hold it more closely, expecting to wring the most they can from their more improvident though perhaps not less worthy and industrious neighbors. Instead of being engaged in producing something by useful employment, many feel obliged to spend their time in seeking to relieve themselves from threatening distress. The president and officers of the bank appear now in a very different character than before, in the prosperous season. Instead of the great bestowers of smiles and favors, they are now looked upon as having the power to administer destruction, and they are cringed to for mercy. Some foreign war, or other distant calamity, is sagely assigned as the direful cause, in order to appease the minds of the people, and divert them from the inquiry into the real cause of this unsuspected course. In the general confusion and distress, reaching even those who had nothing to do in producing it, some are insolvent, and others realize out of their losses a handsome profit. Those who have thus transferred to them the products of the labors of others indulge in extravagance, luxury, and idleness; and those who have lost their property by its sacrifice probably seek relief from the sting of their misfortunes in the indulgence of other vices, and society thus loses the benefit of the industry of both classes. If the forty borrowers and the ten stockholders be thus withdrawn from useful industry and productive employment, one half of the society have the other half thrown upon their support, either as lords and noblemen, or as paupers and convicts. This shaving operation may require a year for its performance. At the end of that time, when the managers and favorites of the bank have so contrived to have half the property of the rest of the community transferred to them, it becomes a matter of inquiry whether it be most to their interest to commence another operation by "expanding" again, or to stop payment and blow up, leaving their creditors to seek their remedy out of an empty corporation. If they commence business again, new life is infused into the community; business again becomes brisk, in the same way, until the proper time for any other curtailment arrives, when the same scenes of distress and panic, sacrifice of property, and ruin, are acted over again. Thus, by alternate contractions and expansions which this bank is enabled to make, and from which its officers and stockholders derive their profits, this little community is kept in a continual fever, first of speculation, then the dubious and restless state between hope and despair, and, finally, the ruin of many; and the few who manage its concerns are daily growing rich, and become the lords and disposers of the property of others, while their more industrious neighbors are their slaves. This epitome may be somewhat overdrawn in its details; but let him who doubts the truth of the representation, in the general outlines, as containing a fair picture of our banking systems, read the history of this country during the years 1818, 1819, and 1820. Let him trace the wild schemes of speculation and extravagance which prevailed for the few years previous, immediately on the heels of the litters of banks chartered by the Middle States from 1814 till 1817, the charter of the United States Bank in 1816, and the extension of the same mania for bank facilities that extended shortly afterwards to the West; let him look at the scenes of distress, failures, bankruptcies, which followed in 1819 and 1820; the stop laws, stay laws, replevin laws, and a host of legislative expedients to which the Legislatures were driven to save the people from absolute and immediate ruin, while bank directors and stockholders were rioting in luxury and rolling in wealth, and the laboring classes driven to poor-houses, or sentenced to penitentiaries; the similar scenes that were acted over again in 1826, and again in 1833-'34, when the United States Bank sought to obtain a continuance of its lordly power through the ruins of the people, and curtailed its discounts at the rate of $2,000,000 per month for that purpose; then say if the representation is much overdrawn.

The objections to the banking institutions of the United States arise chiefly from their being corporations without individual responsibility, and their being clothed with the power of making a paper money circulating medium—in other words, of controlling and regulating the currency.

Corporations of any sort are opposed to the general liberties and equal rights of the citizens. They are protected, generally, by express prohibitions to individuals engaging in the same objects for which they are created. In England they are regarded as favorable to liberty, because their charters are so much power withdrawn from the sovereignty, which, according to the theory of that Government, is vested in the Crown. In this country, whose theory places the sovereign power in the people, they are unfavorable to liberty, for the same reason that they withdraw a portion of the sovereign power from the people. They are only liable in their corporate capacity, being subject to nothing but a corporate responsibility, which may very often be no responsibility at all. What is still worse, however, there is little or no moral responsibility, particularly where there is a powerful motive of interest involved. It is well known that men will do many things, when associated in a corporation, at which they would shudder even to think of as individuals; and no description of corporations has been so conspicuous for the manifestation of moral defections as banking companies. The whole history of corporations is full of examples, proving triumphantly the truth of this position. We select one, as given by Mr. Gouge, extracted from a report made to the Senate of the State of Massachusetts, in January, 1830, as follows: "The Sutton Bank was incorporated the 11th March, 1828. The act of incorporation provides 'that the capital stock of said corporation shall consist of one hundred thousand dollars in gold and silver, to be divided into shares of one hundred dollars each, which shall be paid in the manner following, viz: one half part thereof on or before the 1st day of October [then] next, and the remaining part thereof on or before the 1st day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-nine.' And it further provides that no moneys shall be loaned or discounts made, nor shall any bills or promissory notes be made or issued from the said bank, until the capital subscribed and actually paid in, and existing in gold and silver in said vaults, shall amount to fifty thousand dollars; nor until the said capital stock actually in said vaults shall have been inspected and examined by three commissioners, to be appointed by the Governor for that purpose, whose duty it shall be, at the expense of the said corporation, to examine the money actually existing in said vaults; and to ascertain, by the oaths of the directors of the said bank, or a majority of them, that the said capital stock hath been bona fide paid in by the stockholders of said bank, and towards the payment of their respective shares, and not intended for any other purpose; and that it is intended there to remain as a part of said capital.

"On the 26th day of September, 1828, the Governor, in compliance with an application for that purpose, made by a committee of the subscribers for stock in said Sutton Bank, appointed commissioners to examine the moneys actually existing in the vaults of said bank, as is provided in the second section of their act of incorporation. On the 27th day of September, 1828, the Sutton Bank borrowed, on a deposit of fifty-one thousand dollars in the bills of the City Bank, the sum of fifty thousand dollars in specie for one day only. This same specie was examined by the commissioners, and the following certificates made out, viz:

"We, the subscribers, commissioners appointed for that purpose, have this day been shown, and have examined, fifty thousand dollars in specie in the vaults of the Sutton Bank, which was paid in by the stockholders at their first instalment, agreeably to their act of incorporation, passed the 11th day of March, 1828.

SEPTEMBER, 27, 1828."

"BOSTON, September 27, 1828.

"SUFFOLK, ss:

"Then personally appeared Hezekiah Howe, Jonas L. Sibby, Joshua W. Leland, and Thomas Harbach, being a majority of directors of Sutton Bank, and made oath that fifty thousand dollars in specie, by them shown in their vaults, was the first instalment paid by the stockholders of their bank towards the payment of their respective shares, and not for any other purpose, and that it is intended there in to remain a part of said capital.

Before me, ELIPHALET WILLIAMS, J. P."

"The bills and specie were then re-exchanged, this whole business accomplished within an hour, and all of it done within the walls of the City Bank in the city of Boston."

We have no doubt those were all men who claimed a fair standing in society, and any one of whom would have trembled to commit so shameful an act in their individual capacity, and without the shield of corporate investiture. What would produce a horrible compunction and terror on the mind of one man sits easy when it is divided among all the members of a corporation; but, becoming familiar to corruption in a corporate capacity, men may, and very probably do, sin more easily in their individual character. How many instances have come within our knowledge of mobs, upon the failure of a bank, whose officers were the occupants of spacious houses, living in the height of splendor and luxury, while their creditors were beggared for the want of their honest dues, in which it was difficult to determine which to condemn most—the charter-protected villany of the one, or the misdirected violence of the other! Scenes of that kind have been very frequent, and furnish strong evidence of the corrupting and pernicious tendency of money corporations. Incorporated companies will set up claims of which most individuals would be ashamed, and often, through the influence they can bring to their aid, bear down the rights of an honest individual who cannot compete with them for power. They often set themselves boldly in array against the Government which gave them birth, and sometimes have gone so far as even to claim their privileges as vested rights, that the power which gave them could not take away. The only sort of justification for the creation of such institutions is the accomplishment of some great purpose of general utility, beyond the reach of individual means and enterprise. Lord Coke says, "the granting of exclusive privileges cannot be justified, except on a case being made out of urgens necessitas et evidens utilitas." A corporation for the purpose of building a bridge, a turnpike, a railroad, or a canal, which may produce a work highly beneficial to the public, may be regarded of that description; and it is only on the principle of necessity, being beyond the power of individual enterprise, and not furnishing sufficient interest for the investment of private capital, and the benefits they confer on the community at large, that they can be justified. But what justification can be found for the incorporation of banking companies in necessity arising from the object being beyond the accomplishment of individual means? What is more simple and easy than the loaning of money? Ten men, each owning $1,000, can as easily loan it as ten men united in a corporation owning $10,000 can loan that sum. In the loan of money there is no great undivided purpose to be accomplished, as in the construction of a bridge or a canal; nor is there the production of any thing by labor. It is a single, plain, simple operation, which can be extended by every single capitalist just to the amount of money he has to spare; and neither necessity nor public policy requires the incorporation of a company for the purpose.

Banking incorporations, therefore, not effecting any great public purpose, which may not be accomplished by individual energy, are inimical to the principles of republican government; but, further, as manufacturers of paper money, authorized to denominate as worth so much, and representing so much value, that which intrinsically is worth nothing, they invade one of the high and most important prerogatives of sovereignty, which, as we have already seen, cannot be exercised, even by the supreme power of any Government, without inflicting a deep injury upon its citizens, and perpetrating great injustice. If the Government itself, administered by those who are immediately responsible to the people, whose interests are identified with the people, cannot exert the power of increasing and decreasing the quantity of the circulating medium, thus depreciating its value, without inflicting mischief upon the community, how incomparably more mischievous and destructive to the principles of justice and equality of rights! what madness! to surrender this power into the hands of corporations, whose interests are directly at war with those of the rest of the citizens! It is the advantage of stockholders in those institutions to obtain twice, thrice, or quadruple interest on their capital, whether real or fictitious. Is it not opposed to the interest of the community to pay it? Are not their interests then set in direct conflict? An individual who owns money can only obtain interest, generally six per cent., on what he actually has. Banks, however, are enabled to obtain usurious interest on their actual capital, whether it consists of specie, the notes of other banks—two or three dollars of which are really worth but one in specie—or the stock notes of subscribers, which are worth nothing at all. A bank with a capital of $100,000 is authorized to issue its notes to twice the amount of its capital. It issues its notes to the amount of $200,000, and receives interest, or rather discount, on that sum. Its capital and credit, or faith, that it can redeem and pay two dollars with one, are thus combined together in a tangible form in the shape of bank notes, and it receives at the rate of 6 4-10 per cent. on the whole. Now, what is the difference between receiving $12 80 per hundred, or calling one hundred dollars two—one capital, the other faith—and receiving $6 40 on each? The usury on the part of the bank is the same in both cases. It is true there is this difference in the operation: in paying double interest on the real sum, the borrower pays the whole of it; in the other case, calling it $200, although it really represents but one, it falls upon the whole community, and operates as a tax upon all; and is, therefore, not only usurious but unjust, affecting those who have no participation in the transaction.

The banks take the promissory notes of individuals at $6 40 per hundred per annum interest, paid in advance, and give their own promissory notes in exchange, each hundred of which only represents fifty dollars of their own capital, the other fifty being credit, without interest; in effect receiving interest on the debts which they owe. Mr. Jefferson, in a letter to John N. Eppes, in 1813, says: "At the time we were funding our national debt, we heard much about 'a public debt being a public blessing;' that the stock representing it was a creation of active capital for the alimant of commerce, manufactures, and agriculture. This paradox was well adapted to the minds of believers in dreams, and the gulls of that age entered bona fide into it. But the art and mystery of banks is a wonderful improvement on that. It is established on the principle that 'private debts are a public blessing.' * * * And to fill up the measure of blessing, instead of paying, they receive an interest on what they owe from those to whom they owe; for all the notes or evidences of what they owe, which we see in circulation, have been lent to somebody on an interest, which is levied again on us through the medium of commerce."

The tax levied upon the people for the support of banks, by their privilege of taking bank interest on twice or three times the amount of capital they have, is very clearly and handsomely exemplified by Mr. Gouge, in his valuable Treatise on the American Banking System, at page 24, pamphlet edition. He says, "the thirty-one chartered banks of Pennsylvania had, in 1829, according to the statement of Mr. Gallatin, a nominal capital of $12,032,000. $1,310,000 of this amount were invested in real estate, and $4,620,000 in stocks of various descriptions, leaving the banks $6,102,000 to employ in discounting notes. From the $5,930,000 invested in stocks and real estate, it is to be presumed they derive as much advantage as private persons derive from similar investments. With the remaining $6,102,000 they discount notes to the amount of $17,526,000. On this amount they draw interest at 6 4-10 per cent.; for the usage of the banks is to charge sixty-four days' interest for sixty-three days, and to take the interest in advance.

"The revenue which private capitalists would derive from lending $6,102,000, at the legal rate of 6 per cent., would be $366,120 per annum. The revenue which the banks derive from the management of this amount is $1,121,664. If the banks cannot, by the use of a nominal capital of $6,102,000, draw interest from the people on the sum of $17,526,000, their returns to the Legislature are deceptive. If they actually draw interest on this amount, they draw from the people $755,544 per annum more than would be drawn by private persons lending bona fide capital of the same amount as the nominal capital of the banks.

"Supposing the sums paid in each year, since the passage of the bank act in 1814, to equal that paid in 1829, the total amount paid by the people in sixteen years, over and above 6 per cent. on the loanable capital of the banks, is $12,088,704. A direct tax of half the amount for the support of Government would have produced a rebellion."

"The Bank of the United States had on the 1st of November, 1829, a nominal capital of $34,996,270. Of this amount, $11,717,071 were invested in public stocks, and $3,876,404 in real estate, leaving it $19,402,795 of nominal capital for its proper business of accommodating borrowers and dealers in bills of exchange. On this amount of bona fide capital, lent at six per cent., private persons would draw a revenue of $1,164,167. But the bank, with this amount of nominal capital, discounts notes and bills of exchange to the amount of $40,017,445, from which it derives an annual revenue of $2,561,114, or $1,396,947 more per annum than would be received by private capitalists;" nearly $40,000,000 in thirty years. They may well afford to pay a bonus of two, three, or four millions, for the privilege of taxing the people nearly forty millions. In this estimate Mr. Gouge does not include "what is paid to the bank on the rate of exchange," though he supposes this must amount to hundreds of thousands.

But this is far from being all the tax drawn from the people by the banks. It has already been shown that, by infusing their nominal paper money into the mass of circulation, they depreciate the value of the whole mass, just in proportion to the amount of paper issued, compared with the specie. Though the delusion which is ingeniously kept up of its "convertibility" into specie, (convertible, truly, if not more than one third be demanded,) and being called by the same name, it is palmed off as the representative of specie, although, in reality, three dollars only truly represent one; the whole volume, including the specie, is depreciated, and the prices of all commodities raised. Foreign products and manufactured articles flow into the country, and are sold at the high artificial prices, which must be paid for in specie. There is then a double operation: the specie is driven out of the country to pay for foreign products and manufactures; foreign producers and manufacturers come in competition with those of our own country; and, to counteract the effect of this, the manufacturers here claim a protection from foreign manufacturers by the imposition of duties on foreign imports. These duties are paid by the consumers here; that is, the people pay one tax for the benefit of manufacturers, for the privilege of paying another tax to the banks. Both taxes would be avoided, if the currency of the country were not depreciated by the infusion of bank paper.

We have the authority of Adam Smith, (who has been often quoted as favorable to banks, as he was, but not to the extent for which he is generally claimed as an advocate,) that bank paper drives the precious metals from the country. He says, in book 2, chapter 2, "Let us suppose, for example, that the whole circulating medium of some particular country amounted, at a particular time, to one million sterling, that sum being then sufficient for circulating the whole annual produce of their land and labor. Let us suppose, too, that, some time thereafter, different banks, or bankers, issue promissory notes, payable to the bearer, to the extent of one million, reserving in their different coffers two hundred thousand pounds to answer occasional demands. There would remain, therefore, in circulation, eight hundred thousand pounds in gold and silver, and a million of bank notes, or eighteen hundred thousand pounds of paper and money together. But the annual produce of the land and labor of the country had before required one million to circulate and distribute it to its proper consumers, and that annual produce cannot be immediately augmented by those operations of banking. One million, therefore, will be sufficient to circulate it after them. The goods to be bought and sold being precisely the same as before, the same quantity of money will be sufficient for buying and selling them. The channel of circulation, if I may be allowed such an expression, will remain precisely the same as before. One million we have supposed sufficient to fill that channel. Whatever, therefore, is poured into it beyond this sum, cannot run in it, but must overflow. One million eight hundred thousand pounds are poured into it. Eight hundred thousand pounds, therefore, must overflow; that sum being over and above what can be employed in the circulation of the country. But although this sum cannot be employed at home, it is too valuable to be allowed to lie idle. It will therefore be sent abroad, in order to seek that profitable employment which it cannot find at home. But the paper cannot go abroad, because at a distance from the banks which issue it, and from the country in which payment of it can be exacted by law, it will not be received in common payments. Gold and silver, therefore, to the amount of eight hundred thousand pounds, will be sent abroad, and the channel of home circulation will remain filled with a million of paper, instead of the million of those metals which filled it before. That the issues of bank paper produce the necessity, or the supposed necessity, for imposing duties upon foreign imports, by raising the nominal prices, and turning the balance of trade against us, is equally susceptible of demonstration.

Among the numerous evil tendencies of bank issues, that of promoting extravagant gambling speculations is not the least. Mr. Raymond, in his Elements of Political Economy, vol. 2, page 146, says, with much truth: "None of the great and substantial departments of industry can be prosecuted with money borrowed at bank interest." Again, at page 147: "Speculation is the only business that can be followed with money loaned of banks; and hence we always find that speculation is most rife when banks are most abundant, and when they deal out their notes the most profusely." Again, speaking of bank loans, and speaking of a borrower at bank, he says: "He must employ it in some adventurous speculation, which, if successful, will enable him to pay the interest and leave him a profit; but which, if unsuccessful, may bring him to ruin. Hence, wherever banks have been established in the interior of the country, and the farmers and planters have become the principal customers of the bank, they have generally been ruined. This ever has and ever will be the case, so long as the rate of rent is lower than the rate of interest; and rent in all countries is always two or three per cent. lower than interest." When prices rise, which, as we have already attempted to show, is inevitable on the increase of the quantity of money, without an increase at the same time of value, a spirit, a fever for speculation, is created. Men become dissatisfied with the gains arising from regular and steady habits of industry, and indulge in dreams of splendid fortunes to be amassed in an easier way, by drawing from the industry of others, in speculation.

Simon Snyder, Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, in his message of March, 1813, returning to the Senate of that State a bill, with his objections, very justly observes: "The establishment of twenty-five new banks, dispersed all over the State, with a capital of $9,525,000, would, by the readiness to give credit, invite to visionary speculations, divert men from useful pursuits, damp the ardor of industrious enterprise, and consequently demoralize the community." In his message the next year, accompanied with his objections to another bill of the same nature, which he returned to the Senate, he says: "I cannot divest myself of the fear that, if it should become a law, it would tend only to enrich the wealthy and the speculator, while it would, in various forms, heap burdens on the poor and industrious." In the same message he says: "On the ground of principle, generally, I may confidently say that industry is the only permanent source of wealth. It secures subsistence, and advances our interests by slow yet sure and regular gains, and is the best preservative of morals. Not so speculation, (which this bill seems to invite;) it has the direct contrary effect: depending on no fixed principles, it opens a field for the exercise of ingenuity, ever on the alert to take advantage of the unwary in accidental variations of the times. The success of the speculator by profession tempts the farmer or mechanic to forsake his accustomed honest pursuits. Launched on the wild sea of speculation, ever exposed to deviations from rectitude, his moral principles become weakened, and eventually all sense of commutative justice is destroyed." The last bill passed by two thirds of both Houses, and became a law against the veto of the Governor; and it was found that it led to all the extravagant speculations and pernicious consequences which he had predicted. It was in view, no doubt, of their tendency to luxury, extravagance and inequalities, that Mr. Jefferson, in his letter to the publisher of Destutt Tracy's Treatise on Political Economy, returning the translation to him, and speaking of the merits of the work, says: "By diffusing sound principles of political economy, it will protect the public industry from the parasite institutions now consuming it, and lead us to that just and regular distribution of the public burdens from which we have sometimes strayed."

The wealth of a country consists in its industry and means of promoting and stimulating individual enterprise. Speculators produce nothing; they are the drones of the bee-hive, which live and fatten upon the labor of others. Every citizen, therefore, who is invited by artificial laws to withdraw from the walks of industry, is one member lost to the great wealth and happiness producing family, and imposes an additional burden upon those who remain, besides lessening their motive to active industry. When a large portion of society are induced into speculation instead of working, their aid is not only lost in the support of the Government, so as to increase the burden upon others by that loss, but the rest of the community are obliged to support them, and make fortunes for them besides. They are thus a charge upon community, instead of contributing their proportion to sustain the burden.

One of the most extensive evils arising from the banking system is the fluctuation in all branches of business consequent upon the expansions and contractions of bank issues. The manufacture of paper money being regulated entirely by those whose sole object is their own interest, and who are under no political responsibility, and, as we have seen, very little, if any, moral control, is liable to enlarge or contract, just as that interest, opposed to the general interest, may dictate. The banking institutions of this country are peculiarly unfortunate to the public in their power to produce fluctuations from their expansions and contractions of issues. They have no individual responsibility. A bank here may be incorporated of the most wealthy citizens as stockholders, and yet there is nothing liable but their stock, which is often a very doubtful security. In this respect they differ from the banks in Scotland, the stockholders of which are under an unlimited responsibility; that is, each stockholder is liable in his whole estate for the redemption of their paper, just as the several members of a partnership firm. The stockholders, under such responsibility, will, of course, be cautious not to permit a greater amount of paper to be issued than can certainly be redeemed without risk of their private fortunes. This is a great security, and operates as a powerful check—a check acting upon motives of private interest against excessive issues.

The banks in this country are permitted to manufacture paper for the small circulation. There are none of the States which limit the banks in their issues to a larger minimum than $5, and many of them authorize those of as low a denomination as $1. In some of the States, then, the banks are permitted to furnish the entire circulation above the denomination of $1, which is nearly the same, in effect, as supplying the entire circulation. Supplying of the small circulation has a most powerful influence upon the business of the mass of community. If our banking institutions were limited, in all the States, to the issues of notes of $100, or $50, or even $20, we should soon see a great change in the health of the currency. A large portion of the dealings of our society is below either of those sums; and, although we should have bank notes above them, specie would of course flow in to supply the place of the small notes below. It is believed that half the dealings of the community are below $50. The Bank of England, although incorporated in 1694, had never issued any notes of less denomination than £20 (nearly $100) until 1759; and its whole issues up until 1780, at any one time, were no more than six or seven millions of pounds. Until after that time, no great fluctuations or consequent bankruptcies were experienced. Soon afterwards, when it began the issues of £1 notes, and extended its issues, embarrassment and fluctuations took place. The first which we have seen noticed by political writers is that in 1783; then followed by that of 1793, 1797, 1816, 1819, and 1825; all which have become celebrated in the history of the politics of that country; and, in every instance, as proved by Tooke, Mushet, Parnell, and others, it was preceded first by an extravagant expansion, and next by a contraction of the issues of the bank. In 1797, the Bank of England suspended specie payments, and so continued to refuse the redemption of its notes with specie until 1822, when it resumed them under an act of Parliament of 1819. In 1829, it ceased to issue notes of a less denomination than £5, (about $24,) and has so continued since. In this respect, the Bank of England is not so objectionable as our banking institutions, and its issues are not so subject to fluctuations as ours, nor so injurious to small dealers, constituting the great mass of society. It is worthy of remark too, that, owing to the state of society there, $24 is a much larger sum, compared with other commodities and labor, than here. The Bank of England is the only banking institution within sixty-five miles of London. Beyond that distance from London, there are a great number of joint stock companies, which issue notes and are controlled by the Bank of England.

Your committee had intended, under this branch of inquiry, to present in some detail a history of banking in the several States, with a view of showing that, in proportion to the extent of the issues of bank paper beyond their specie capital was the rise in prices; that this was necessarily followed by a contraction of issues, and in that proportion was the fall of the prices of all other commodities. We are not without abundant historical facts on this subject, to be derived from our periodicals and public journals. The history of our political economy will show, very conclusively, that every instance of great rise in prices followed excessive bank issues and speculation, and over-trading the consequence; that in proportion to the suddenness and rapidity of the rise from the expansions of bank issues was the consequent contraction of discounts and the fall of prices. But they feared that their remarks had already extended in length beyond any interest they could give to the subject, and therefore have omitted it, believing it to be more important to present principles in a brief form than to burden their report with details of facts and figures, which might weary rather than elicit any interest.

From what has preceded, it will be seen that the object of your committee has been to prove that the banking system in this country is subject to many and grave objections, arising mainly from the banking institutions being incorporated bodies, with exclusive privileges, and under a limited responsibility—little better than none; and their being authorized to issue bank paper to supply even the small circulation, to the amount of twice, thrice, or quadruple, their specie capital; thus invading the high sovereign power of regulating the measure of value, which is only safely intrusted to the Government, administered by those who are responsible to the people. Who would be willing to intrust in the hands of an irresponsible corporation the power of adulterating the coin with alloy, as might best suit their interests, and withdrawing that alloy in the same way? And what difference is there between adulterating the coin at their pleasure, and decreasing and enhancing the value of the mass of circulation, by withdrawing and issuing bank notes as they please? What farmer would not be startled at a proposition to intrust corporations with the power of regulating the weights and measures of commodities in which he dealt, so as to measure his wheat with a large bushel measure when they wished to buy, and a small one when they wished to sell; to measure his butter with a large pound weight when they wished to purchase, and a small one when they wished to dispose of the same article? And what difference is there between controlling the measure of value and that of weight or measure? Who would be willing that the power of levying taxes for the support of Government should be delegated to corporations, whose proceedings were only known to a few who managed them? And yet we submit to their power of imposing taxes much heavier, to support themselves, and grow rich at the expense of the people. The regulating and controlling the currency is as necessarily an act of the Government as any other act of sovereignty, and should be exercised by the same authority.

Mr. Tooke, in his Treatise on Currency, page 125, justly remarks: "Next to the administration of the State, there is no administration of any officer so immediately and extensively affecting the interests of the community as that which is intrusted to the persons [the bank directors] who are invested with the privilege of issuing paper money; and who, by the manner in which they exercise that privilege, have it in their power to produce great changes in the property and condition of every individual in the kingdom. No man, or set of men, ought, in my opinion, to be intrusted with that privilege." It was in view, no doubt, of the exercise of this high prerogative of sovereign power by the banks here, that Mr. Jefferson, and other enlightened patriots, spoke in such strong terms against the system, as being an aristocracy of a dangerous tendency and character. Mr. Jefferson, in a letter to John N. Eppes, (4th vol. Mem. 201,) says: "Private fortunes, in the present state of our circulation, are at the mercy of those self-created money-lenders, and are prostrated by the floods of nominal money with which their avarice deluges us." Again, on another occasion, he says: "The bank mania is one of the most threatening of these imitations [of England;] it is raising up a moneyed aristocracy in our country, which has already set the Government at defiance; and although forced to yield a little on the first essay of their strength, their principles are unyielded and unyielding. They have taken deep root in that class from which our legislators are drawn; and the sop of Cerberus, from fable, has become history. Their principles take hold of the good, their pelf of the bad; and thus those whom the constitution has placed as guards to its portals are sophisticated or suborned from their duties. That paper money has some advantages must be admitted, but its abuses are also inveterate; and that it, by breaking up the measure of value, makes a lottery of all private property, cannot be denied."

John Taylor, in his Inquiry into the Principles and Policy of the Government of the United States, page 291, compares the banking system to the feudal system of Great Britain, and says: "Had banking been called a 'paper feudal system,' and had the barons proposed to take it by that denomination as a reimbursement for their abolished tenures, it might have been fairly weighed against the landed feudal system, to estimate the effects of the exchange." Mirabeau once forcibly remarked, "All paper money is a phrensy of despotism run mad."

Your committee come now to the third inquiry proposed, which was,

What remedy can be provided against the evils arising from our banking system?

It is generally much easier to point out evils than it is to provide remedies; and so it is, perhaps, in the subject under consideration. It would not be difficult to point to a remedy if all would agree to it, so as to carry it into effect; but on a subject so complicated, and of so deep importance, it could hardly be expected that there would not be some conflict of opinion.

It would be premature, in the opinion of your committee, to undertake at present the passage of any specific provision until the subject shall be discussed and fully deliberated upon by the people. It would be particularly unadvised to propose and discuss any constitutional provision of so much importance at a short session of Congress.

Your committee have, therefore, thought proper to content themselves with presenting some of the various suggestions which have been occasionally made by men whose opinions are entitled to consideration, and submitting a proposition, not with a view of any legislative action at the present time, but that it may go before the people, to deliberate upon it, discuss its merits, and suggest such modifications as they may think best. They do not pretend to decide that the proposition they submit is perfect, or that it is the best that could be proposed; but in order that something tangible may be thrown out, they have chosen to present the broadest proposition of which the subject is susceptible.

Mr. Jefferson seemed to entertain the opinion that an easier way of effecting a remedy should be sought than the formality required in the constitution for its amendment. He did not raise any other objection to a constitutional amendment than the difficulty of succeeding in obtaining it. In the 4th vol. of Mem., page 220, in a letter to Mr. Epes, already quoted, after commenting upon the evils arising out of our banking system, he says: "But no remedy is ever to be expected while it rests with the State Legislatures. Personal motives can be excited through so many avenues to their will, that in their hands it will go on from bad to worse, until the catastrophe overwhelms us. I still believe, however, that, on proper representations of the subject, a great proportion of these Legislatures would cede to Congress their power of establishing banks, saving the charter rights already granted. And this should be asked, not by way of amendment to the constitution, because until three fourths should consent nothing could be done; but accepted from them, one by one, singly, as their consent might be obtained." The principle he advances is predicated on the ground that the incorporation of banking companies for the circulation of notes is pernicious, but doubts whether three fourths of the States would surrender; and therefore, and for that reason only, suggests that the proposition should be made to the States singly, to cede their power of authorizing companies to issue notes of circulation. It is not to be presumed that Mr. Jefferson, who was always well known to be opposed to a United States Bank, intended to convey the idea, by the State Legislature ceding to Congress their power of establishing banks, which he speaks of, that it should be done in such a manner and to such extent as to enable Congress to establish similar institutions, with the same power of circulating their paper, and controlling and depreciating the currency, as the State banks or the late Bank of the United States.

Mr. Raymond, in his first volume of Political Economy, page 252, proposes that "Government manufacture a paper currency in the form of our present bank notes, payable in specie on demand at the Treasury, or at such other places as the convenience of the Government and the public may justify." In his second volume of the same work, he says: "Let it [the Government] take into its own hands the engraving and manufacturing of bank notes, all except the signatures, and establish a mint, and appoint officers, under proper responsibilities, for that purpose." He is not explicit in his proposition as to the power of the Government to take into its hands either the issuing the notes or manufacturing the paper under its control, to be issued by such officers as he speaks of. It may well be doubted if the National Government possesses any such power under the present provisions of the constitution. If it does not, it could not obtain it in any way but by an amendment in the mode provided in the constitution itself; and it may well be questioned if it would be sound policy to provide an amendment conferring such power on the National Government. Some have proposed such an amendment of the national constitution, providing that the banking incorporations in the States shall be graded, so that those of large capital may be limited to notes above one hundred or five hundred dollars, and those of smaller capital to the issue of notes of still smaller denomination, but that none should issue notes of less denomination than twenty dollars. If such a constitutional amendment were agreed to by the States, your committee entertain no doubt whatever that that it would tend much to purify the currency, if it could be enforced; but it would be extremely difficult to provide against its evasion, and the corrective of its violation must necessarily be left with the State Legislatures. Others, again, have suggested the propriety of amending the constitution in such manner as that no State incorporate banking institutions with power to issue notes beyond the amount of specie capital in their vaults. If such a provision could be carried into effect, it is believed the work of reform in the banking system would be accomplished. But little mischief, and much good, might flow from a system carried out on that principle. The great evils arising from the present systems spring from the power which the banks either possess or usurp, of extending their issues far beyond the amount of specie they have, and thus depreciating the whole circulating medium. The difficulty, however, would be to prevent evasion of such a provision. We have seen in the case of the Sutton Bank, placed under the immediate control of the law of its creation and existence, a glaring evasion of its clear and undoubted provisions, by the commission of a base fraud and falsehood. The more remote restraint of the federal constitution would be much more liable to evasion in the same way, and much more difficult to be applied as a corrective, than an act of the State Legislature.

Gabriel Slaughter, Governor of Kentucky, in his message to the Legislature of that State, in 1818, holds the following language: "I am indeed ready to confess, before my countrymen, that my sentiments, or perhaps prejudices, ever have been, and still are, strongly against the banking system. I have ever viewed these moneyed corporations with jealousy. I consider the corporate powers and privileges conferred on them as so much taken from the power of the people, and a contrivance to rear up in the country a moneyed aristocracy. Money is power, in whatever hands it is placed; but it is less dangerous when divided among individuals, than when combined and organized in the form of banks. In vain did the American people, during their struggles for liberty and independence, destroy the landed aristocracy then existing under the law authorizing estates to be entailed, if a moneyed aristocracy is to be substituted. Instead of having our National and State Legislatures filled with men representing the feelings and interests of the great agricultural class of the community, I fear we shall see these banking aristocracies greatly preponderate on the legislative floor. I must ever be opposed to any system of policy which, independent of its pernicious and corrupting influence in other respects, tends to diminish, if not to destroy, the weight and influence of the farming interest, upon whose virtue and independence the duration of our free institutions so essentially depends.

"While this system exists in other States, Kentucky can do little to rescue the country from the evil and anti-republican tendencies of these moneyed corporations. Let us, therefore, invite a co-operation in some plan, coextensive with the Union, to redeem this young and rising republic from the mischief and dangers of this paper system, before it is too late. If permitted to progress and interweave itself with all the interests and concerns of society, it may, in a more advanced and dense state of our population, explode in a convulsion of the Government. The disease, it is true, has taken deep root; but the American republic is young, and, by a vigorous and determined effort, may, in a few years, exterminate it. Some time may be necessary to enable these institutions to wind up. To effect so desirable an object, I would recommend to the Legislature to propose an amendment to the federal constitution, providing that, after a certain period, no incorporated bank should exist in the United States; or if this should be thought going too far, and banks in any shape, or to any extent, are useful and necessary, let the banking powers be limited, and the system so regulated and restricted, as to secure the community against the wide-spread ruin and mischief with which we are threatened." Resolutions were offered in the Legislature of that State on the 4th of January, 1819, in accordance with the sentiments of Governor Slaughter, but never carried out any further.

It is obvious that the evils arising from a vicious banking system, grown up under the legislation of States confederated as the United States are, cannot be remedied but through an amendment of the constitution itself. No one single State can act efficiently, without the co-operation of others. However fallacious the argument may be, the excessive issues of bank paper in one State are used to induce others to either engage or continue in the same error. One will not seek to correct it, lest another may not; and thus, what perhaps all would cordially and cheerfully agree to, acting together, no one will commence alone. While the banks of one State issue notes to the amount of $3 or $4 for one of specie, those of others issue $8 or $9. While some banks in the same State issue $2 or $3 in paper for one of specie, others issue $5, $6, or $8 for one; so that we have not only, in the language of Mr. Madison, quoted, "as many currencies as States," but nearly as many currencies as banks. Let not this be used as an argument for a national bank. Such an institution, based on the principle of manufacturing paper money, is calculated rather to augment than remedy the evil.

Your committee respectfully suggest whether it be not more appropriate, as well as more practicable, in adopting an amendment to the constitution, to provide against the kind or nature of institution, rather than the extent or mode of operations of any particular kind of institution; whether, for example, it would not more comport with the nature of a constitutional provision, that no State shall incorporate a bank of circulation, than that it shall incorporate no bank authorized to issue notes beyond a certain amount proportionate to its capital, or notes below a certain denomination. They have, therefore, thought proper, on full and deliberate consideration of the whole subject, as far as they have been able to investigate it, to submit the broadest proposition of an amendment to the constitution, that no State shall authorize any company or individuals to issue notes for circulation as bank notes. They do this, not with a view to the immediate action of Congress, which they deem at present as inexpedient and premature; but that some proposition may be thrown out in a tangible shape before the people, for their discussion and deliberation, should they feel that the subject is of sufficient importance to enlist their attention.

Is there any thing unreasonable in the proposition? It is calculated to meet precisely the evils now, which were met by the provisions of the constitution then, as it was then adopted and now stands. Are the States less patriotic, less disposed to yield to each other for the good of the whole, than they were fifty years ago? Would not such a mutual concession of all promote the advantage and interest of each? If money would be scarcer, it would be proportionately better, and uniformly and permanently the same. We have now in the United States $140,301,038 of paper money in circulation, and about $30,000,000 of specie, or five and a half paper dollars for one of specie, in circulation; and about $40,000,000 specie in the banks, making about one specie dollar, in all, for three of paper. On the adoption of such an amendment as suggested, the banks would gradually cease as their charters expired, and the transition from a paper manufactured currency, subject to constant fluctuations and panics, to a steady and uniform standard of value, would be so slow and gradual, that it would not be felt to the same extent as has often been done by a sudden contraction of bank issues, after an excessive stimulus given by an expansion.

Your committee cannot close this report without discharging a further duty to the memorialists. They have been assailed, both in Congress and out of it, as aiming to place the States under the control of the National Government, as though it were a great advantage to the States to have their citizens taxed for the support of bankers and speculators. They have been charged as a description of disorganizers, seeking to overturn the State Governments, and concentrating all power in the Federal Government. This charge has been made, too, by advocates of the doctrine that Congress have a right to establish a national bank. Your committee see no foundation for the bitterness that has been manifested towards them. They have, as they had an undoubted right, sent their memorials, suggesting to Congress the consideration of a grave and important question of general concern, couched in appropriate and respectful language, and under circumstances which exclude all possible idea of selfish or sinister motives. They are respectable and intelligent citizens of the United States, and suggest the consideration of their views precisely in the way pointed out by the constitution under which we all live. If a citizen of this Union conceives he has a claim upon the Government, and prefers his petition, it is respectfully received and considered, whether his claim is founded in error or not, although he has a direct and personal interest. How much more is the memorial of citizens, on a subject of general interest, entitled to respect! The suggestion they make is not new. It has been made by as wise and as good men as any by whom they have been assailed here and elsewhere.

The spirit of inquiry is the life of republican Governments, and should be rather promoted than discouraged, even if the sentiments advanced at the start are mistaken or erroneous. Whenever that is attempted to be stifled or hushed to silence by misrepresentation, persecution, or other weapons than those of reason and argument, it is a sure indication of some lurking tyranny that fears the light, suspicious or self-conscious of the defective tenure by which it rules.

With these remarks, and with the purpose before indicated, your committee submit the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following amendment to the constitution of the United States be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States, for their ratification, agreeably to the provisions of the fifth article of the constitution :

"No State shall authorize any incorporated company to issue any bank note, or other paper, for circulation."

AGENT OF DEPOSITE BANKS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 1, 1837.

Mr. Garland, of Virginia, from the select committee to which the subject had been referred, made the following report :

The select committee to which was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives, directing them to inquire "whether the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money have all or any of them, by joint or several contract, employed an agent to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business at the Treasury Department; what is the character of the business which he is so employed to transact, and what compensation he receives; whether such agent, if there be one, has been employed at the request or through the procurement of the Treasury Department; whether the business of the Treasury Department with said banks is conducted through said agent; and whether, in the transaction of any business confided to said agent, he receives any compensation from the Treasury Department," has had the same under consideration, and respectfully report :

That, in making the inquiries committed to its charge, the committee has been compelled to encounter many questions of power and discretion of a most delicate and embarrassing nature; delicate, as sometimes encroaching upon the precincts of private reputation and private transactions; embarrassing as to the line of privacy and confidence beyond which the committee could not pass without violating private rights and private confidence. The first of these grew out of the protest of Reuben M. Whitney, a witness summoned before the committee to testify, (see journal, p. 67,) against the requirement of the committee in the resolution of the 7th of January last, found in the 4th page of the journal, and the powers of the House of Representatives to make the examination, as directed in the resolution organizing the committee, and directing its inquiries. It is not the purpose of the committee to enter into a long or detailed answer to said protest; they have not time, if they were disposed, nor is it necessary to do so. As relates to the resolution of the committee, the whole argument of the protest is based upon the idea that the committee has asserted a claim of power, in compelling the production of private papers, and in examining into private transactions, which it has not done; the resolution is general, and calls for no specific paper; it calls generally for such papers, &c. as may refer to, and shed light upon, the inquiries directed by the House. The committee, in adopting this resolution, made it general, because they had no knowledge of the particular character of the papers held by the witness, whether they were of a purely private or public character, and could not, therefore, designate any particular paper for which to make a call; and because they thought it due to the witness himself that he might have the opportunity of producing such papers of a private character as he might deem necessary for the purpose of explanation, if such explanation should be deemed necessary by him. Immediately following the adoption of the resolution referred to, the committee made an express reservation of the question, what papers they would or would not compel the production of, until the witness had determined, for himself, which he would or would not produce, having reference to the necessity of explanation as affecting himself. The reservation is in these words: "To the adoption of the foregoing resolution Mr. Martin objected, upon the ground that he doubted the power of the committee, upon the showing then before them, to require the production of all the papers therein required; and moved for a division of the resolution, so as to take the question upon ordering the subpoena for Mr. R. M. Whitney, and the subpœna duces tecum to him separately; which motion was withdrawn, upon the understanding with the committee, generally, that the question of power to enforce the command, if objected to by Mr. Whitney, to whom the subpœna duces is directed, is reserved." The committee has not, in a single instance, attempted to enforce the production of any paper objected to by the witness. As to the question whether the House of Representatives had the power to direct the inquiries contained in the resolution organizing the committee, it is not deemed necessary to make any remark. In adopting the resolution, it is to be presumed the House well understood its power and its duty, and did not hastily institute inquiries beyond the reach of one or the other. The committee does not claim for the House, or itself, the power to compel the deposit banks to expose their private concerns or private transactions to the scrutiny of the committee, nor has the committee, in any instance, demanded such exposure. Yet, while the committee does not assert any such claim of power, it holds it decidedly within the power of Congress to ascertain, by other competent and legal testimony, any of the transactions of the deposit banks which are calculated to affect the safety of the public funds, and to render some action, on the part of Congress, necessary for their security.

The second grew out of the propriety and effect of many interrogatories which the committee did not object to, or permitted to be propounded to various witnesses, affecting, as they might do, purely private transactions and private reputation. In this state of difficulty, it was thought best, and most comporting with justice to the witnesses themselves, to permit the inquiries to be made, and in every case leave the witness to determine for himself whether he would answer or not, as the committee could not upon all occasions determine how far the witness might desire to answer for the purpose of explanation, as before remarked. The committee does not deem it proper to conclude that, because a witness might refuse to answer what would in his estimation be a breach of confidence, the refusal ought to involve even a suspicion of guilt; if this were the case, the rule of legal and social propriety, which protects from scrutiny, by any tribunal, a man's private and confidential transactions, would be but a snare to deceive ignorant and entrap the unwary. The committee could not upon all occasions, when questions were proposed seemingly irrelevant, determine to what relevancy a train of interrogatory based upon it might lead; and could not, therefore, with propriety, withhold many interrogatories of that character which were propounded. The committee attempted to shape its course, under these delicate and embarrassing circumstances, by a just regard to the public interest and the private rights and reputation of individuals; if, in doing so, they have erred, they did so from motives any other than a disposition to become inquisitors of private character or private business.

The resolution of the House directs the committee to make several inquiries, to which they will proceed to respond in the order of the resolution.

The first inquiry directed to be made is, "Whether the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money have all, or any of them, by joint or several contract, employed an agent to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business at the Treasury Department." The evidence before the committee, of the Hon. Levi

Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury, and many of the officers of several of the deposit banks, proves that several of the deposit banks have, by separate contract, appointed an agent to reside, and who does reside, at the seat of Government, charged with the duties of a corresponding agent of the banks by which he is employed; but it does not appear that he is clothed by these banks with any authority whatever to transact their business with or at the Treasury Department; on the contrary, it is proved, by the testimony of Mr. Woodbury, Mr. Whitney, several clerks of the Treasury Department, and the officers of the various deposit banks, that the agent has no such authority. For the correctness of this conclusion, the committee refers to the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 11th January last, to their resolution of the 7th of the same month, on the 4th page of the journal, and his parole examination; to the testimony of McClintock Young, page 96, 3d paragraph of his answer to the 1st interrogatory; of James Howard, president, and James L. Hawkins, cashier, of the Franklin Bank of Baltimore, page 130, in which they say: "The entire business of the bank with that Department has uniformly been transacted by its president or cashier, directly with the Secretary at the head of the Department, the Treasurer of the United States, or one of the legally constituted officers of that Department." The testimony of Hugh W. Evans, president, and Robert Mickle, cashier, of the Union Bank of Maryland; in their 1st and 36th answers, page 132 and 133, they say: "The Union Bank of Maryland has never employed any agents to transact business with the Treasury Department, having always corresponded directly with it, touching its employment as a deposit bank." The testimony of James Schott, president of the Girard Bank, of Philadelphia; on journal, page 150, he says: "He is vested with no authority whatever to act on any subject, or on any occasion, on behalf of the bank, in relation to its business." The testimony of William D. Lewis, cashier of said bank; on journal, page 152, he says: "So far as the Girard Bank is concerned, it has no agent at the seat of Government, with the powers alluded to. The whole of the business of the bank with the Treasury Department, since it has been a depository of the public money, has been transacted directly by the president of the bank and myself." Again, page 154, 8th answer, he says: "The business of the Treasury Department with the Girard Bank is not conducted through the agent at Washington." The testimony of George Newbold, president of the Bank of America; on journal, page 160, he says: "To the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th requisitions, he says that the Bank of America has not, at any time, employed an agent at the seat of Government to transact its business with the Treasury Department; it has been uniformly and wholly transacted by the bank, directly with the Secretary of the Treasury, and other proper and official officers of the Treasury Department." The testimony of Thomas W. Olcott, president of the Albany Farmers and Mechanics' Bank; journal, page 242, he says: "All business transactions between that Department and this bank are direct; and there is no intermediate organ or agent of communication, other than the duly acknowledged and properly constituted officers of that Department." Again, on page 243, No 12: "Our corresponding agent may advise us, and suggest matters for our consideration, but he has no authority for our instructions;" and to the concurring testimony of William Neil and J. Delafield, president and cashier of the Clinton Bank of Columbus. The force of this positive testimony from the Secretary of the Treasury, and many of the deposit banks who have employed a resident agent at the seat of Government, is not broken by the adverse testimony of a single deposit bank, or a single witness speaking from his knowledge. The committee, therefore, feel themselves fully warranted in the conclusion that the deposit banks, or any of them, have not, by joint or several contract, employed an agent, to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business at the Treasury Department.

In coming to this conclusion, the committee are well apprized, from the evidence before them, that there are some occasions upon which some of the deposit banks, through their agent, have presented some suggestions to the Treasury Department, in relation to the public deposits, and that these suggestions have received a respectful consideration, and perhaps may have induced some action on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, in reference to them, such as the business referred to in the following extract from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to wit:

"8. The names of the banks employing said agent are, with the few exceptions before alluded to, unknown to me except by rumor.

"Besides the Planters' Bank at Natchez, and the Commercial Bank at Cincinnati, copies of whose correspondence have already been furnished, I think that in one or two cases of difference of opinion as to claims made by the banks through their agent, and in those alone, a written communication was shown to me by him, concerning the authority confided by them." [p. 13 of journal.]

And the evidence of the Secretary of the Treasury, contained in his answer to the 44th question:

"Question 44. In the cases alluded to in your report of the 11th instant, where the Planters' Bank, Natchez, and the Commercial Bank, Cincinnati, confided authority upon said Whitney, as shown to you in a written communication, what was that authority; what were the claims or requests made by him; what was the case of the Commercial Bank at New Orleans?

"Answer. The cases referred to in my report of the 11th instant, where differences of opinion occurred, and an authority was produced, but not found necessary to be filed, were those of the Commercial Bank at Cincinnati and the Commercial Bank at New Orleans. I mentioned the Planters' Bank only as one to which a general notice had been given, and was on file, as to his agency, and a copy of which was annexed. The particular case of the Commercial Bank at Cincinnati was, so far as I recollect, a letter which he held in his hand and read, wishing him to request the Department to change the place to which some of the transfers outstanding against it were to be made, such as from other parts of Ohio or Kentucky to New Orleans or Philadelphia, and stating the reasons for the request to be, that the banks in Ohio and Kentucky would probably demand specie, or be less accommodating as to payments than those at a distance. I think it stated, further, that an extension of some of the transfers was desirable, if the Department could conveniently grant it; and complained that the time already allowed was too short. The agent, also, urged both these requests, assigning similar reasons; and that the time granted, in several cases, was less than that formerly allowed, under like circumstances, to the United States Bank to make transfers. I declined to change the places from Ohio and Kentucky, as requested, because, under the late deposit law, I felt bound to confine to the neighborhood those particular transfers till about money enough was placed in Ohio and Kentucky to meet their share of the anticipated division of the surplus and the current expenditures, rather than send it to a distance; but the time for some of the transfers, which seemed too short, I proposed to extend as long as seemed to be proper. He, however, declined taking such extension in behalf of the bank, unless I could make it longer, thinking it would not be useful so little extended; and, therefore, I wrote to the bank itself what had been proposed to him, and his declining it; and that I should, notwithstanding, give the extension which to me seemed suitable; and the bank, if not accepting it, might pay the money over at the time originally fixed. In respect to the Commercial Bank at New Orleans, the application by the agent was, according to my recollection, with a letter, setting out that the Department had, by transfers and warrants, drawn out, or proposed to draw out, all, or nearly all, the public money in its possession, and wishing him to request it to revoke some of the transfers, and possibly to postpone some to a much later day, if none could be revoked. I informed him that the bank must be in error, as, before signing a transfer, or sending one, I was always careful to see that it would not reduce a bank too low. I sent for the clerk who had charge of the subject, and examined into it critically; and declined to revoke any of them, as I felt satisfied that the bank and its agent considered the money the bank had been notified it would probably be called on to pay the State of Louisiana during 1837, but for which no transfers had then been issued; and which, I told him, would not be issued when the time of payment arrived, provided the bank should, before that time, be drawn down too low. I informed him, also, that the bank had, by mistake, included one transfer, in order to make out its case, which had never been issued, according to our records; and, hence, I could not revoke any that had been issued. He seemed to be satisfied that the bank was right. Whether any extension of time were given in this case, I do not remember, but know that none were given beyond the period of the quarterly payments to the States, for which purpose these transfers had been seasonably ordered." [Pages 59 and 60 of journal.]

But these occasions, so far as disclosed by the evidence, have been rare, and not incompatible with the general conclusion to which the committee has arrived.

In instituting this agency, the committee cannot perceive that the banks have violated any principle, either legal or moral, or violated their compact with the Government constituting them depositories of the public money. The several deposit banks, with the exception of the Bank of the Metropolis, in this District, received their charters from the several State Governments in which they are located, and are responsible to their several State authorities only; they have the undoubted right to institute agencies at their own expense, at any place, to transact any lawful business, without restriction on the part of this Government. If they, or any of them, have instituted an agency incompatible with the interests of the Government, or in violation of their compact, the only remedy in the hands of this Government is, in the first case, to discontinue the offensive banks as public depositories, and, in the second, to seek redress, through the proper judicial tribunals, for any injury sustained. The committee does not perceive that any part of the compact between the Treasury Department and the several deposit banks prohibits the institution of such an agency, and consequently that said agency is not in violation of it. If the Congress of the United States has the power to restrict the institution of lawful agencies on the part of banks deriving their powers from State authorities, they would have the same power to restrict individual agencies, and extend its powers into all the ramifications of social intercourse, however private and confidential, and mould them to its own views of propriety or purposes of power—a claim so startling, from its enormity, as to exclude even a moment's consideration as to its existence.

It will be here proper to remark that Reuben M. Whitney is the agent of most of the deposit banks which employ one; but that one or two of them have other agents, whose names the committee deems it unnecessary to mention.

The second subject of inquiry directed to the committee is, What is the character of the business said agent is employed to transact, and what compensation he receives?

The committee, in responding to this inquiry, cannot do it more intelligibly or more accurately than by employing the language of the Secretary of the Treasury, and of the various officers of the deposit banks employing said agent, who have testified upon this occasion, and who describe the character of the agency referred to. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his response to the resolution of the committee, before referred to, says:

"I know nothing with accuracy, beyond what has already been stated, as to the duties he is to discharge for those banks which employ him. But I presume, as just intimated, it is to communicate the earliest information on all subjects he may suppose to affect their interests, whether as public depositories or private banking institutions; to give his advice and aid when called for, or deemed useful in the transaction of their business of either character; to be the organ, at times, of presenting their wishes to the Department, in respect to subjects connected with their public obligations; and to procure here and communicate the best intelligence in his power on the state of the money market at home or abroad; on the condition of the currency and of the exchanges; and on the supposed legislation likely to happen in Congress, either as to the banks themselves or as to heavy appropriations to be paid by them; and, in fine, on any other topic which he may consider interesting or beneficial to his employers."

In the same report, and in the testimony of the Secretary, the same description of the business of said agency is substantially given, perhaps in a mere minute and expanded form, to which the House is respectfully referred.

The testimony of James Schott, president of the Girard Bank, states: "That the Girard Bank has had, and still has, an agent, who resides at Washington, whose duty it is to communicate to his principal whatever information he may obtain touching the interest of the bank, and having a bearing upon its safe, useful, and profitable management." The preamble and resolutions of the Bank of America, on page 161, are also descriptive of said agency:

"Whereas the opinion has been entertained and expressed that the interests of this bank, and the other banks in this city, as well as the interests of the commercial community, may be promoted by the employment of a suitable person, resident at Washington, to act as agent for the three deposit banks in this city, to obtain and communicate to them, with the full consent and approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury, seasonable information from time to time, on the following points, as well as other general or particular information, which may be useful and proper to communicate, viz:

"The amount of revenue receivable at New York for a period of two or three months to come.

"The amount, or probable amount, of public money to be disbursed here, or the amount that the three deposit banks in New York may be called upon to pay for that purpose, and for a like period.

"The amount of public money that they may probably be required to transfer, and the time when and the place or places where the transfers are to be made.

"Therefore, resolved, That the president and cashier of this bank be, and they are hereby, authorized, in co-operation and conjunction with the two other deposit banks of this city, or with the presidents and cashiers thereof, to appoint such person as they may deem suitable and proper to act as agent for the purposes aforesaid, and to agree to make the said agent suitable compensation for his services: Provided, That the amount to be paid him by this bank shall not exceed the sum of six hundred dollars per annum."

In the testimony of James Dodd and William T. Hooker, president and cashier of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Connecticut, this agency is thus described: "To the 23d we answer, that R. M. Whitney, Esq. was the agent of this institution at Washington, as will appear by the documents hereto annexed, and on the terms therein specified, from whom we expected, and occasionally received, printed statements showing the condition of the deposit banks, and aid (in case we should derive it through him) in obtaining from the Treasury Department further sums on deposit, with a view to a full remuneration for the business done by this institution for the Government." They further state, page 242: "To the 30th interrogatory we answer, that no particular powers or duties were, by this institution, confided to Mr. Whitney. It was expected that the institution might be benefited by the communication of such information as he might from time to time possess."

The testimony of Thomas W. Olcott, president of the Albany Farmers and Mechanics' Bank, page 243, states: "Our corresponding agent may advise us, and suggest matters for our consideration, but he has no authority to issue instructions for our government."

With the testimony referred to, the testimony of the officers of all the deposit banks employing said agent, which has been taken, accords in their statements of the business which said agent is employed to transact. Taking the whole of the testimony referred to in reference to this branch of the inquiry, in connexion with that in reference to the previous, it is obvious that said agent is not only not clothed with authority to transact the business of the deposit banks with the Treasury Department, but that he has no authority whatever but that of collecting and communicating such information as he may deem important to the advancement of the interests of the banks employing him. The committee would in vain look into the testimony for any authority imparted to this agent, by the banks for which he acts as agent, to bind them in any business transaction with the Treasury Department whatever, of however insignificant a character. No such authority can be found in the correspondence between the said banks and the Department; nor can it be found in any paper delivered to the agent, so far as has been disclosed to the committee; nor can it be found in the correspondence between the banks and the agent. All deny it. The authority to make or unmake contracts between the banks and the Treasury Department, and to regulate their fiscal transactions, would not be incautiously or inconsiderately delegated, because it involves consequences of too great importance to be carelessly made; and if such important authority had been delegated upon the present occasion, it seems to the committee that some authentic evidence of it could be found, and that such an important matter would not be left to mere inference or conjecture.

The deposit banks, having the uncontrollable right to institute such an agency as this, had an equally uncontrollable right to select such agent as they deemed proper and best suited to promote the objects they had in view. The committee, therefore, deem it unnecessary and improper, in responding to this inquiry, to say any thing as to the character or qualifications of the agent.

The great advantages which would accrue to the deposit banks in the existence of such an agency at the seat of Government, conducted by a competent agent, must be obvious to every mind. The Treasury Department is in the weekly receipt of statements of the condition of the deposit banks, of commercial information from every quarter, and is daily drawing drafts on the various deposit banks, to meet the obligations of the Government. It cannot be doubted that certain and early information upon these subjects, affecting as they do almost every branch of business in the community, must be of very great importance to these institutions, enabling them, as it will do, to make suitable preparations for such demands as may be made upon them.

The committee has not been able, from the testimony before them, to detect a single instance in which the Secretary of the Treasury has imparted to the agent information incompatible with the strictest propriety or the public interest; the same means of information have been afforded him which are accessible to all agents of any character, of whom there are many, or any citizen who may desire it.

The committee does not doubt that the institution of the agency referred to was the result of the selection of the deposit banks as the fiscal agents of the Government; nearly if not all the inducements to establish such an agency would not have existed, had it not been for this fact. Washington city, in a mere commercial point of view, would, perhaps, have been the very last city in the Union in which such an agency would have been established, but for the connexion which the selection of these banks, as public depositories, produced one among another, and with the Treasury Department; hence, the committee feel no hesitation in asserting the opinion that this agency was produced by the fiscal relations between the deposit banks and the Government.

The compensation which the agent receives depends entirely upon the discretion of the banks which employ him; it has hitherto varied from $4,000 to $7,000, as far as can be ascertained from the evidence before the committee. As no part of the compensation paid by the banks is chargeable upon or reimbursed by the Government, the committee has not deemed it necessary to make a very accurate estimate. The banks having the undoubted right to dispose of their own money in their own way, and upon such objects as they choose, the committee deems any further response to this branch of the inquiry unnecessary.

The third inquiry is, Whether such agent has been employed at the request or through the procurement of the Treasury Department?

In responding to this inquiry, it will be proper to remark that the original scheme, after the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, was, to create a bureau in the Treasury Department, having special charge of the correspondence and transactions between the deposit banks and the Treasury Department.

The character of the proposed scheme is contained in a letter addressed by the Girard Bank, the Manhattan Company, the Mechanics' Bank, the Bank of America, the Commonwealth and Merchants' Banks, Boston, to Roger B. Taney, the predecessor of the present incumbent of the Treasury Department, to which reference may be had; and it is in these words:

To the Hon. R. B. TANNEY,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington.

SIR: The contract between the State banks and the Department over which you preside, in relation to the collection and disbursement of the public revenue, contemplates the appointment, and stipulates for the payment, by the said banks, of an agent or agents, as well as the payment of all the expenses incurred by the Department arising out of the late transfer of the public business to those institutions. We deem it of the utmost importance to the permanent success of the measure, that a uniform system of operations should be adopted by all the banks which may be selected by the Government as its fiscal agents. In proportion as this system shall be well digested and executed will be the soundness and equality of value, throughout the Union, of the circulating medium; and upon it will depend the degree of convenience or inconvenience which may be felt by the public in consequence of the recent change.

To secure these important objects, great vigilance will be required. The operations of the selected banks must be specially and carefully observed, particularly in reference to their dealings in inland bills, their local discounts, their issues of paper, and their provisions for redeeming that paper at the remote points to which it will be carried by the natural current of trade. We consider that there is a strong analogy between the Bank of the United States and its branches, as at present organized, and the Treasury and its selected bank agents, when the selection and appointment shall be finally completed. The business of the officers of the Bank of the United States is confided to a committee of the board of directors, called "the committee on the branches;" and one department, in the mother bank, is exclusively charged with the business of those offices. In this department, their returns are received and examined, their operations inspected, and the general correspondence attended to. We respectfully suggest, that we believe the success of the measure now in progress of completion will be much promoted, and all the banks employed essentially benefited, by the creation of a bureau in the Treasury Department for the discharge of duties of a similar character. The benefits which would result to the banks employed, we believe, would far outweigh any consideration of the expense which it might occasion. Practical talent would be most effective, and, consequently, most serviceable.

With these preliminary observations, we most respectfully solicit that such a bureau may be created in your Department, and, at the same time, we take the liberty to recommend, as a proper person to take charge of the same, Mr. R. M. Whitney, of Philadelphia, who, from his great attention to the subject, and his practical knowledge of finance and banking, we believe to be in every way qualified satisfactorily to perform, under your supervision, the duties of the station. Should you think proper to adopt our suggestion, and appoint Mr. Whitney, we will cheerfully contribute our portion of the sum of five thousand dollars per annum, as his salary, and a full share of all the other expenses which, in your opinion, may be necessary to give effect to this project, arising either from the appointment of an additional agent or agents, or from any other arrangements which may be deemed expedient by you.

We have the honor to remain, most respectfully, your obedient servants—

Mr. Taney did not feel himself authorized to establish such a bureau in the Department. On the 4th of November, 1834, Reuben M. Whitney addressed a letter to the present Secretary, in the following terms:

WASHINGTON, November 4, 1834.

SIR: The enclosed letter, signed by the deposit banks in Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, addressed to the Hon. R. B. Taney, Secretary of the Treasury, was communicated to him in October of last year.

At that time it was deemed best to defer acting upon it until after the meeting of Congress. That body met and adjourned, without any definitive legislation upon the subject of the deposit banks. The same, we have good reasons to suppose, will be the result of the approaching session, if renewed legislation shall be proposed. It is the opinion of many well-informed persons, that the public interests, as well as those of the deposit banks, will be greatly promoted at this time by the aid and action of a central agency, established upon some principle, particularly in relation to organizing and permanently establishing a system of domestic exchanges throughout the country, with which its general interests and that of the currency are so deeply connected.

In many other respects, it is believed that such an agency will be equally beneficial.

I take the liberty of enclosing, herewith, the letter containing the suggestions of the deposit banks before alluded to, for your consideration, or adoption of any course which you may think proper in relation to the same.

I am, with respect, your most obedient servant,

R. M. WHITNEY.

HON. LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury, Washington.

Enclosing the foregoing letter to him for consideration, to this letter the Secretary addressed, on the succeeding day, a reply in these words:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

November 5, 1834.

SIR: Your communication, addressed to my predecessor, has been perused by me, and, in reply, I would observe that my own views in relation to its contents correspond, it is believed, substantially, with those entertained by him. But though we both have been satisfied that, under the present laws and appropriations applicable to the Treasury Department, no such agency as that proposed can be established by the Secretary of the Treasury, yet it must be obvious that the selected banks themselves might, in a fiscal and commercial view, derive great advantage from the services and correspondence of an agent of their own, resident in this city, and devoting special attention to their interests. I hardly need assure you that, in respect to information in the possession of this Department, which might be deemed useful, and which could be furnished without detriment to the public welfare, it would at all times be cheerfully given to any such agent of any of the selected banks.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury,

R. M. WHITNEY, Esq., Washington.

This is the only act of the present Secretary, adduced in evidence, which can possibly be construed into a recommendation or procurement of said agency in any form. This letter is a reply to another in which the propriety of a bureau, or some agency charged with such duties as are described in the letter from the banks, is recommended for the consideration and approbation of the Secretary. The Secretary, in this reply, expresses the same opinion which had been expressed by Mr. Taney, that the Department had no authority to establish such an agency; but that the selected banks themselves might, at their own expense, establish such an agency; and that, in a fiscal and commercial point of view, they (not the Department) would evidently derive great advantages from it. This subject of this agency did not originate with the Secretary of the Treasury; it was proposed by the banks themselves; the Secretary merely expressed an opinion that, in a fiscal and commercial point of view, such an agency would be advantageous to the banks, without, in a single sentence, recommending to the banks the establishment of the agency, but leaving them to determine upon its propriety, according to their own discretion. It is true, the Secretary, in his reply, assures Mr. Whitney that he will cheerfully afford any information within his power, not incompatible with the public service, to any agent who may be selected by the banks, if such an agency be established; but does not, in a single word, urge them to adopt the measure. There was no necessity for any recommendation or procurement of such an agency, on the part of the Secretary; for the most important deposit banks were already aware of the advantages of such an agency, and were actually seeking its establishment. How far this letter can be construed into a recommendation of R. M. Whitney, the committee will leave the public to judge; for, although the very letter which was enclosed by Mr. Whitney from the banks contained a strong recommendation of him, yet the Secretary does not employ a single word of recommendation in the reply. It is true, Mr. Whitney used this letter as a letter of recommendation, and it is true some of the deposit banks were induced by that letter to appoint Mr. Whitney their agent, believing it compatible with the views of the Department; but the Secretary is not responsible for any misconception of this letter; his motive in writing the letter is one thing, and the construction of it by others another. It was addressed to Mr. Whitney, and not to the banks. The letter must speak for itself, and afford its own true construction.

Apart from the letter referred to, the evidence of Mr. Woodbury and the deposit banks all proves most decidedly that there was neither recommendation nor procurement of the agency or the agent, on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury; all concur in denying it in the most unequivocal terms. If any further proof of the justice of this conclusion were necessary, it will be found in the fact that in the new contracts with the deposit banks, under the act of the last session, and all the correspondence upon the subject, not a single expression is to be found in reference to this agency or this agent; because, as is stated by the Secretary, it is of no advantage to the Treasury Department, and does not, in the slightest degree, lessen its labors growing out of the deposit system.

The fourth inquiry is: Whether the business of the Treasury Department, with said banks, is conducted through the said agent? The committee need only refer to the report of the 11th of January, from the Secretary of the Treasury, and the evidence already adduced, to prove that the business of the Treasury Department with the deposit banks is not conducted through said agent. In addition to this, the committee would refer to the evidence of several of the clerks of the Department who have been examined, and testify that the business of the Treasury Department with the deposit banks is conducted directly with the banks themselves. All the correspondence produced is directly between the Department and the banks, without the intervention of an agent. The committee, therefore, respond to this inquiry, that the business of the Treasury Department with the deposit banks is not conducted through said agent.

The fifth inquiry is: Whether, in the transaction of any business confided to said agent, he receives any compensation from the Treasury Department? The testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the agent himself, and of all the banks employing the agent, concurs in proving that the said agent receives not a cent from the Treasury Department for any services whatever. In the whole mass of the immense volume of testimony which has been taken, there is not the slightest circumstance to create even a suspicion that the agent receives any compensation from the Treasury Department. It may be argued, but your committee think without reasonable propriety, that but for the fiscal relations of the banks and the Government, growing out of their selection as public depositories, the agent would not have been appointed; and although the agent receives no compensation directly, yet the salary which he receives is indirectly from the Treasury Department. The committee regard this argument as too far fetched. The selection of the principal deposit banks as public depositories necessarily increased their business and enlarged their sphere of operations. One of the increased expenditures which they incur, growing out of their increased business, and the profits to be derived from it, is this agency; the expense is incurred from their own means, and cannot be charged even indirectly to the Department. They owed it to themselves to turn their fiscal relations with the Government to the best advantage, and must necessarily incur the increased expenditure growing out of it. The committee, therefore, confidently respond that the agent receives no compensation whatever, either directly or indirectly, from the Treasury Department.

The committee might here close their report, and confidently submit the truth of the conclusions to which they have arrived to the House of Representatives and the American people, but they do not feel themselves justified in concluding their report without adverting to two single subjects, about which the public mind is misinformed and its judgment misled. It has been frequently said that R. M. Whitney, the agent of the deposit banks, occupies a room in the Treasury building. It is true that Mr. Whitney occupies a room in the same block of buildings with the Treasury Department, and under the same roof; and from this fact, without a knowledge of the whole truth, the suspicions of many have been excited that Mr. Whitney was in the employment of the Treasury Department. The fact, however, is, that the building used by the Treasury Department is individual property, and hired by the Government. The room occupied by Mr. Whitney is hired by him directly from the owner, without any reference to the Treasury Department whatever.

This circumstance, taken in connexion with the fact that two or three series of circulars of Mr. Whitney to each of the deposit banks, one to each of the public receivers, and tabular statements of the condition of the banks, which Mr. Whitney had occasionally prepared, had been franked by the Secretary of the Treasury, was calculated, in the views of many, to induce the suspicion which has been alluded to. The committee, without any further remark, annex the following explanation, given by the Secretary himself during his examination upon this subject.

"I have never, knowingly, franked any written letter of Mr. Whitney's, or allowed him to use my franking privilege for any purpose; but, as stated in one of my former replies, on one occasion, I assented to his request to frank a printed communication on public matters connected with the arrangements of the deposit banks, as to the kind of paper money they had agreed to accept and credit as cash from the public receivers who deposited with them, respectively, and addressed or enclosed only to the public officers and banks employed as fiscal and public agents of the Department. It may be, also, that in some instances a printed tabular statement of the condition of the public depositories, extracted by him from our returns, and addressed to them alone, may have been franked by me; but I have no particular recollection of any such case. My instructions to the chief clerk are, not to lay before me, to be franked, any thing but letters from the Departments, or public documents; and in some cases, where explained and thought to be proper, communications on public subjects, addressed to public officers connected with the Department. Perhaps I ought to add, to prevent mistakes, that I sometimes frank the letters of the bureaus, and occasionally of the other Departments, when the heads of them happen to be absent, and take it for granted that they are proper communications to be franked, without making special inquiry; as I also presume to be the case with all communications laid before me by my own clerks, under the general instructions and usages of the Department, without always opening them or reading their address." [See journal, pp. 60, 61.]

And that of Mr. Whitney, given on page 87, answer to 35th interrogatory:

"The Secretary of the Treasury franked, or authorized to be franked, two or three of the circulars furnished to the committee, marked A, one of each of which was forwarded to many, if not all, of the deposit banks; and of one of them a copy was sent to each of the receivers, also franked by him; also, tables showing the condition of the deposit banks, which I have occasionally prepared, the character of which was, in all cases, made known to him, on the papers themselves being first shown to him. Beyond these I do not recollect that he has ever franked, or authorized to be franked, any communications to the banks, or to any person whatever, of mine." [See journal, pp. 87, 88.]

The committee regards this explanation, the truth of which is sustained by other officers of the Department, as entirely satisfactory.

It has been said that the operations of the Treasury Department, in relation to the public deposits, have been conducted with a view to political party considerations. The evidence before the committee is, that, in the propositions to select one or two banks as deposit banks, political considerations have been urged upon the Secretary of the Treasury, but that the Secretary, in all cases, either reproved the attempt or treated it with silence. There cannot be found one single instance, in the evidence, in which the Secretary has attempted to exert such influence. The operations of the Department in relation to the public deposits are of a very difficult and delicate character, arising from the immense amount of revenues, the various and distant points at which it is collected, the number of banking institutions in which it is deposited, and the frequent transfers made necessary by the deposit act of the last session. It is not to be expected that in these operations entire satisfaction will be given to all; and it is quite probable that dissatisfaction, arising from other causes, has been ascribed to political feelings. The committee are entirely satisfied that no just cause for the imputation exists. The committee here subjoin the statement of the Secretary upon this point:

"In the mean time, the inquiries made by me to any persons who were considered by me capable of giving correct information, were directed to the facts and considerations connected with the above topics; and the information communicated to me in return, and that communicated voluntarily, related chiefly to the above topics. But I have no doubt the persons making those communications have, in some cases, mentioned political circumstances in connexion with this subject, and in general as opposed to the propriety of the selection. A majority of the stockholders and officers have usually been stated to be, when any thing was said in respect to their politics, opposed to the views of the administration.

"I have no recollection of any particular remarks of a political character made by him or others on this point, beyond such ones as are above described, and those in only a very few cases.

"But, always deeming it my duty to select suitable banks, and enough in number, at the proper points, for the safe keeping and disbursing of the public money, I proceeded, after proper inquiries as to their condition and character, to select those above named on those accounts, and notwithstanding any objections which may have been urged by any one, of a political character, as to any of them.

"In the cases of the banks in North Carolina and South Carolina, as well as Indiana, Virginia, and Kentucky, and the three banks in Pennsylvania, the selections were made because we had no banks whatever in those States; and the others were selected because, in two instances, at points where no deposit banks existed, and in two where additional ones appeared to be required by the importance and extent of the public business to be transacted there, and after full investigation of their ability and fitness to transact the public business." [See journal, p. 51.]

In the examination of the evidence, it will be perceived that there is a large amount of negative evidence, going to strengthen the positive evidence which has induced the conclusions to which the committee have arrived.

The committee, having thus briefly examined the evidence pertinent to the inquiries directed to it, have adopted and report the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money have not all, or any of them, by joint or several contract, employed an agent to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business with the Treasury Department.

2. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That no agent for the transaction of business between the deposit banks and the Treasury Department has been employed at the request, or through the procurement, of said Department.

3. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That the business of the deposit banks with the Treasury Department is not conducted through any agent, but is transacted directly with the Secretary of the Treasury, or some officer of the Department.

4. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That no agent, in any way connected with the public deposits, since the removal of said deposites from the Bank of the United States, has received any compensation from the Treasury Department.

5. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That several of the deposit banks have employed an agent to reside at the seat of Government, for the purpose of receiving and transmitting information affecting the interests of said banks, both from the Treasury Department and other sources, and transmitting public documents. That agent is Reuben M. Whitney, who receives such salary from said banks as they annually deem his services worth.

The undersigned, one of the members of the select committee appointed to inquire whether the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money have all, or any of them, employed an agent, to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business with the Treasury Department, having voted against two of the resolutions adopted by the committee, on which their report is based, and believing that the committee have drawn erroneous conclusions from some of the testimony presented, begs leave briefly to submit the grounds of this difference, and his reasons for not concurring in the report of the majority of the committee. He would first remark, however, that, agreeing with the views of the committee in the greater part of their report, he regrets the difference of opinion on the points to which he has alluded.

One of the resolutions adopted by the committee, to which he dissented, is in the following words, to wit:

"Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That no agent, for the transaction of business between the the deposit banks and the Treasury Department, has been employed at the request, or through the procurement, of said Department."

The undersigned is of opinion that the letter addressed by the Secretary of the Treasury to Reuben M. Whitney, on the 5th of November, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

November 5, 1834.

SIR: Your communication, addressed to my predecessor, has been perused by me, and, in reply, I would observe, that my own views in relation to its contents correspond, it is believed, substantially, with those entertained by him. But though we both have been satisfied that, under the present laws and appropriations applicable to the Treasury Department, no such agency as that proposed can be established by the Secretary of the Treasury, yet it must be obvious that the selected banks themselves might, in a fiscal and commercial view, derive great advantage from the services and correspondence of an agent of their own, resident in this city, and devoting special attention to their interests. I hardly need assure you that, in respect to information in the possession of this Department, which might be deemed useful, and which could be furnished without detriment to the public welfare, it would at all times be cheerfully given to any such agent of any of the selected banks.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

R. M. WHITNEY, Esq., Washington—

and which was used by the said Whitney as a letter of recommendation, did procure his appointment as agent to some of the deposit banks; and that the said banks were induced to believe, from information derived from the said Whitney, that his appointment as agent to the said banks was desired by the President of the United States, and by the Secretary of the Treasury. The anonymous letter addressed to some of the banks, recommending said Whitney in the following terms: "The President and Secretary of the Treasury, I know, view the subject in the same light that I do, and will be gratified if the banks will establish such as agency; and, from his talents, experience, and fidelity, no appointment would be more acceptable to them than that of Mr. Whitney, who has already been recommended to the Department;" which said letter was enclosed in several communications written by Whitney himself to various banks, soliciting the appointment of agent, containing the following paragraph: "With this, I forward you the copy of a letter written by a person high in the confidence of the Executive, to some friends in New York and Boston"—was, in itself, sufficient to create this impression. But other testimony going to establish the fact has been adduced. Indeed, the officers of some of the banks expressly state that, in appointing the said Whitney, they acted under this impression. Nor is it to be presumed, from the objections which existed to the appointment of R. M. Whitney as agent, that the deposit banks alluded to would have selected him, had they not been induced to believe that his appointment was desired by the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury.

The next resolution adopted by the committee, for which he did not vote, is as follows:

"Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money have not all, or any of them, by joint or several contract, employed an agent, to reside at the seat of Government, 'to transact their business with the Treasury Department.'"

The undersigned is of opinion that, although the great mass of the business of the deposit banks with the Treasury Department is transacted by the banks with the said Department, it is clearly shown, by the evidence of the Secretary of the Treasury himself, that, in particular instances, some of the deposit banks have transacted business of an important character with the Treasury Department, through their agent, Reuben M. Whitney.

H. JOHNSON.

REPORT OF THE MINORITY.

Mr. PERRY, from the select committee appointed by the House of Representatives on the 3d of January, 1837, to inquire "whether the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money have all or any of them employed an agent, to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business with the Treasury Department;

what is the character of the business which he is so employed to transact, and what compensation he receives; whether such agent, if there be one, has been employed at the request or through the procurement of the Treasury Department; whether the business of the Treasury Department, with such banks, is transacted through the said agent; and whether, in the transaction of any business confided to said agent, he receives any compensation from the Treasury Department," submitted the following as the views of the said minority:

The resolution of the House resolves itself into six distinct heads:

1st. Have all or any of the deposit banks employed an agent, to reside at the seat of Government, for the purpose of transacting their business with the Treasury Department?

2d. What is the character of the business he is employed to transact?

3d. What compensation does he receive?

4th. Was such agent or agents employed at the request or through the procurement of the Treasury Department?

5th. Is the business of the Treasury Department conducted through the said agent?

6th. Does he receive any compensation from the Treasury Department?

First. Have all or any of the deposit banks employed such an agent as is described in the resolution of the House? The creation and object of the agency, the employment of the agent, and character of his business, are so inseparably connected, that they will be considered together. An agency of some kind appears to have been contemplated, from the earliest inception of the project of substituting the State banks as fiscal agents in the place of the Bank of the United States.

In the instructions communicated by the President, through the Secretary, to Amos Kendall, special agent of the Department, who was appointed on the 23d day of July, 1833, to visit the State banks, make certain propositions and inquiries for the purpose of ascertaining upon what terms and conditions they would receive the public deposits and become fiscal agents of the Government, it is stated as follows, to wit:

"That the said bank will render, or cause to be rendered, every service, without charge, which can now be lawfully required of the Bank of the United States."

"That the primary and secondary banks shall make returns of their entire condition to the Secretary of the Treasury monthly, or oftener if he shall require it, and report to the Treasurer of the United States the state of his deposits with them, respectively; and that they shall also subject themselves to a critical examination of their books and transactions by the Secretary of the Treasury, or an authorized agent, whenever the Secretary may require it."

In the proposition submitted by Mr. Kendall to the banks, it is stated as follows:

"That your bank shall submit its books and transactions to a critical examination by the Secretary of the Treasury, or any agent authorized by him, whenever he shall require it, and shall pay a due proportion of the expenses attending the appointment of an agent from time to time, either temporary or permanent, to examine and report upon the accounts of the bank which may be employed by the Government."

In the contracts made between the Treasury Department and the banks who become depositories of the public money before the passage of the act of Congress regulating the deposits, on the 23d day of June, 1836, will be found the following stipulations, to wit:

"Articles of agreement of the Bank of the Metropolis with the Secretary of the Treasury, October 9, 1833.—If the Secretary of the Treasury shall think proper to em-employ an agent or agents to examine and report upon the accounts and condition of the banks in the service of the Government, or any of them, the said bank agrees to pay an equitable proportion of his or their expenses and compensation, according to such apportionment as may be made by the said Secretary."

Thus it appears that the necessity for an agent has been admitted, his appointment contemplated, and his compensation provided for, to be paid by the deposit banks, from the first inception to the final consummation of the present scheme of State depositories. Is there or is there not, in substance if not in form, such an agency as is contemplated by the resolution of the House of Representatives? That there is, the minority of the committee think is susceptible of the clearest demonstration, from the evidence which has been taken by the committee. It is true that the law contemplates a known responsible agent, to be placed as a guard over the public money in the deposit banks; the present is a secret, illegitimate, irresponsible agent, placed by the banks as a spy over the Treasury Department, with an interest adverse to that of the public. That there is now, and has been since a short time after the Hon. R. B. Taney left the head of the Treasury Department, resident at this city an agent of many of the deposit banks, will abundantly appear from the testimony taken by the committee. It is equally manifest, from the evidence, that no such agency was established while the Hon. William J. Duane or the Hon. R. B. Taney was at the head of the Treasury, notwithstanding extraordinary efforts were made to accomplish that object during their administration of the Department.

The first effort which appears to have been made by Reuben M. Whitney, who is the principal agent of the deposit banks in this city, is shown by a letter from the said Whitney to William J. Duane, then Secretary of the Treasury, bearing date, Washington, June 15, 1833, a few months after the said Duane went into office, and several months before the deposits were removed from the Bank of the United States. This letter begins with the following sentence:

"Having enjoyed the confidence of the President to a great degree upon the subject of the bank, and that which relates to it, in which he has taken an interest, and knowing the views of the President upon the subject of the removal of the public deposits, and that he does not now look upon that as a mere isolated measure, but as a part of, and connected with, the general policy of his administration, therefore I look upon that measure as definitively resolved upon, so far as his views and recommendation have weight and influence." He adds: "I have good reason to believe that the President will forward a communication from New York to you, expressive of his views and wishes upon the subject."

He (Whitney) suggests the importance of the agency, and makes a tender of his services, and adds:

"I have never spoken to the President upon this subject, but circumstances lead me to think that I should not be otherwise than perfectly acceptable to him. The only persons to whom I have mentioned the subject, connected with the Government, are Messrs. Taney and Kendall; to the former gentleman a week since, at Baltimore, who replied in these words: 'I have always understood, and taken it for granted, that you were to have the situation when it is created.'"

It is due to the Chief Justice to state that he gives to the above statement, upon his oath, an unqualified contradiction. But with this imposing array of high officers, including the President himself, when said Whitney approached Mr. Duane, then newly installed Secretary of the Treasury, it was of no avail; he received no encouragement, as the following extracts from Mr. Duane's letter, so highly creditable to him, will show. He says, in reply to Mr. Whitney:

"Whenever the President shall express his wishes in relation to any subject, or with regard to yourself, I will so act, I trust, as to merit the respect of the President, and preserve my own."

[See the letters at large, on the printed appendix to the journal.]

The efforts of said Whitney to procure the agency while the Hon. R. B. Taney was at the head of the Treasury were no less extraordinary, and attended with no better success. In the month of October, 1833, the said Whitney draughted a letter, and, procuring the co-operation of six of the principal banks in Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, caused himself to be recommended to the Hon. R. B. Taney, then Secretary, as a person every way qualified to take charge of a bureau to be created in the Treasury Department, at a salary of five thousand dollars per annum. According to this scheme, the Treasury Department was to be assimilated to the Bank of the United States, while the deposit banks were to be viewed in the light of branches of the mother bank, (the Treasury,) and Mr. Whitney, at the head of his bureau, was to represent a committee of the board of directors, called the "committee on the branches. In this department their returns are received and examined, their operations inspected, and the general correspondence attended to." The original of this letter, of which a copy is herewith appended, is acknowledged by said Whitney, in his examination before the committee, to have been written by himself.

Whether Mr. Taney made a written reply to this letter does not appear. If he did, however, it could not have been favorable to its objects, or that reply would probably have been used, as the reply of Mr. Woodbury to the same communication has since been used, by said Whitney, as a recommendation to the State banks to employ him as their agent. There are two distinct propositions contained in the letter now under consideration: 1st, to create a bureau in the Treasury Department; 2d, that Mr. Whitney shall be placed at the head of that bureau. That Mr. Taney was unequivocally opposed to each proposition, is manifest from his letters to Thomas Ellicott and Reverdy Johnson, Esq's, as well as his evidence, reported to the House. (For letters, see appendix.)

After Messrs. Duane and Taney had retired from the Treasury, and the Hon. Levi Woodbury was placed over that Department, Mr. Whitney renewed his efforts with better success, and accomplished his object in an indirect manner, obtaining a better salary than he would have received at the head of the proposed bureau, with the power to increase his compensation without any other limit or restraint than what the banks themselves might be able to oppose to his demands, while his situation opened a field of speculation difficult to resist by any one who is subject to the influence of great pecuniary temptation. Mr. Whitney enclosed the said letter from the six deposit banks in Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, sent by them to Mr. Taney, to Mr. Woodbury, in his letter of the 4th November, 1834, which letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, November 4, 1834.

SIR: The enclosed letter, signed by the deposit banks in Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, addressed to the Hon. R. B. Taney, Secretary of the Treasury, was communicated to him in October of last year.

At that time it was deemed best to defer acting upon it until after the meeting of Congress. That body met and adjourned, without any definitive legislation upon the subject of the deposit banks. The same, we have good reasons to suppose, will be the result of the approaching session, if renewed legislation shall be proposed. It is the opinion of many well-informed persons, that the public interests, as well as those of the deposit banks, will be greatly promoted at this time by the aid and action of a central agency, established upon some principle, particularly in relation to organizing and permanently establishing a system of domestic exchanges throughout the country, with which its general interests and that of the currency are so deeply connected.

In many other respects, it is believed that such an agency will be equally beneficial.

I take the liberty of enclosing, herewith, the letter containing the suggestions of the deposit banks before alluded to, for your consideration, or adoption of any course which you may think proper in relation to the same.

I am, with respect, your most obedient servant,
R. M. WHITNEY.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington.

[For letter enclosed in above, see pages 160, 161, ante.]

In this letter of Mr. Whitney he appears to have abandoned nothing of his original purpose, except in the mode and manner of accomplishing the same. He adheres to the objects of the agency, but appears to be prepared to give up the Treasury bureau for a central agency, established upon "some principle, particularly in relation to organizing and permanently establishing a system of domestic exchanges throughout the country, with which its general interests and that of the currency are so deeply connected. In many other respects (he continues) it is believed that such an agency will be equally beneficial. I take the liberty of enclosing, herewith, the letter containing the suggestions of the deposit banks, before alluded to, for your consideration or adoption" [not of the bureau, but] "of any course you may think proper in relation to the same." To which Mr. Woodbury returned the following answer:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
November 5, 1834.

SIR: Your communication, addressed to my predecessor, has been perused by me, and, in reply, I would observe that my own views in relation to its contents correspond, it is believed, substantially, with those entertained by him. But though both have been satisfied that, under the present laws and appropriations applicable to the Treasury Department, no such agency as that proposed can be established by the Secretary of the Treasury, yet it must be obvious that the selected banks themselves might, in a fiscal and commercial view, derive great advantage from the services and correspondence of an agent of their own, resident in this city, and devoting special attention to their interests. I hardly need assure you that, in respect to information in the possession of this Department, which might be deemed useful, and which could be furnished without detriment to the public welfare, it would at all times be cheerfully given to any such agent of any of the selected banks.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.
R. M. WHITNEY, Esq., Washington.

If it were possible to misunderstand the effect and intention of Mr. Woodbury's letter, he has explained both in his communication to the committee. (See journal of committee, page 12.) He says:

"To that application I made answer the ensuing day, stating what was my own opinion and what was understood to be the opinion of my predecessor, (corresponding with my own,) that the Treasury Department, under the existing laws, had no authority to constitute any such office or agency, and, if one was appointed, it must be done by the banks themselves."

It is manifest that the same object was to be accomplished, the same agency to be constituted, the same officer to be appointed by the banks themselves, which the Secretary of the Treasury had been applied to to constitute, but which he declined, alleging as a reason the want of power "under the existing laws." About the same time that Mr. Woodbury made those suggestions, on the 5th November, 1834, Mr. Whitney obtained a letter, dated Washington, 8th November, 1834, of which he speaks as follows, in a letter addressed to the President of the Bank of Burlington, Vermont:

"With this I forward you the copy of a letter, written by a person high in the confidence of the Executive, to some friends in New York and Boston."

The following is an extract from the anonymous letter to which he referred for a more particular understanding of the objects of the agency, and the character of the business which was to be committed to his charge:

"The President and Secretary of the Treasury, I know, view the subject in the same light that I do, and will be gratified if the banks will establish such an agency; and, from his talents, experience, and fidelity, no appointment would be more acceptable to them than that of Mr. Whitney, who has already been recommended to the Department."

The chief clerk in the Treasury Department, McClintock Young, Esq., states as follows, (see page 96, journal of the committee:)

"Question 1. State all you know upon the subject of inquiry contained in the resolution of the House, which is now before you.

"Answer. There is an agent of some of the deposit banks residing in Washington, R. M. Whitney. My information on the subject is derived partly from letters from banks on file in the Treasury Department, and partly from having heard Mr. Whitney say he was employed by some of the banks as their agent. I know nothing of any agreement or contract he may have with any of those banks. The character of his business I believe to be, to attend to their interest so far as it relates to their connexion with the Treasury Department; that is, he attends generally to all matters in which their operations are required, in relation to the keeping, disbursing, and transferring of the public money. Those operations sometimes operate, as the banks say, injuriously to their interests, and he has frequently called on the Secretary, and other arrangements have been made, I presume and believe, on his representations," &c.

"2d. To the same. Does he or does he not examine the returns, &c. of the deposit banks, and prepare the statement of their condition?

"Answer. He is allowed to have access to the returns made to the Department by the deposit banks. He has prepared tabular statements of their condition, for the information of the several banks.

"3d. Are these statements substantially communicated to Congress? Have you any recollection of such an instance?

"Answer. I know but of one such statement, prepared by him, having been communicated to Congress, and that was appended to the Secretary's annual report, I believe at the session of 1835-'36. The document so transmitted was, I believe, revised by one of the clerks regularly employed for the purpose." (P. 96 and 97 of journal.)

Samuel McKean, Esq., a clerk in the Department, says, in answer to the 8th interrogatory:

"Mr. Whitney prepared a tabular statement showing the condition of the deposit banks near the 1st of January, 1835, a copy of which was appended to the annual report of the Secretary to Congress, in December, 1835. I cannot state positively whether that table was examined by any person in the office. There was annexed to that table a statement showing the exchange operations of some of the banks, which I understood was prepared by one of the clerks in the office, from information furnished by Mr.

Whitney. Mr. Whitney also prepared a table of the same description, showing the condition of the deposit banks, 1st December, 1835. This table was very carefully examined and compared by myself with the statements received from the banks, and in some minor points corrected; copies were made and annexed to the same report, I think, of the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress. All the other tables of the same description, up to the time of the passage of the deposit act, were prepared by clerks in the Department, principally by myself." (See journal of the committee, p. 113.)

Same witness, at page 112, in reply to the 4th interrogatory, says:

"I have no doubt that the selection of the deposit banks was sometimes a subject of conversation between the Secretary of the Treasury and Mr. Whitney, and that the Secretary obtained from Mr. Whitney all the information he could, to enable him to decide as to the propriety and expediency of selecting particular banks. Whilst the statements of the condition of the deposit banks were in my possession, Mr. Whitney had access to them occasionally, and I have sometimes called on Mr. Whitney, as being familiar with the subject, to explain certain items which I did not exactly comprehend. Mr. Whitney has frequently had access to the accounts of the Treasurer with certain banks. How far he may have influenced the Secretary in making transfers I cannot say, though I believe that in some cases, at his instance, the periods for transfers have been extended."

Richard Ela, Esq., a clerk in the Department, says, in answer to the 2d interrogatory, at page 108 of the journal, among other things:

"On two or three occasions Mr. Whitney has applied to the Secretary, having first explained his business to me, for extension of transfers; on several, indeed I may say many times, he has applied to examine the returns of the banks."

John McGinnis, Esq., a clerk in the Department, charged with the care of business appertaining to the public lands, states, (see p. 95):

"2d Question. At what time did R. M. Whitney come into the Department, and what has been the nature and character of his business, so far as you know?

"Answer. Mr. Whitney's business with the Department commenced soon after Mr. Woodbury took charge of it, as well as the witness can recollect. The precise nature or character of his business is not known to me, but it is generally understood that he is the agent of several of the deposit banks.

"3d Question. Has R. M. Whitney had access to the files of papers in your room? If yea, state whether it has been a common habit with him; if nay, give the particular instances of that nature.

"Answer. Mr. Whitney has on two or three occasions referred to papers in my charge relating to the sale of the public lands, and on such occasions witness believes it was to procure information for some public use. In one instance, the purpose was stated to be for the use of a Senator.

"4th Question. Has he or has he not taken the files of original papers containing returns from the land offices, or some other papers, to his own room, to be examined?

"Answer. Yes, in the instance referred to in answer to question third, Mr. Whitney applied to me to see the returns of the moneys received at the land offices, in payment for public lands. They were shown to him; and, after looking at them, he desired me that I would permit him to take them to his room, stating, at the same time, the object for which he wanted them; and I did not hesitate to let him have them. They were returned on the following day.

"5th Question. For what object did he state he wanted them, and who was the Senator awaiting in his room to obtain the information? State also when it was.

"Answer. The object was said to be to ascertain the particular kind of moneys in which the payments for public lands were made. The information was stated to be for the use of the Hon. T. Benton, and the occasion referred to was soon after the commencement of the present session of Congress. I am not sure whether Mr. Benton was said to be in Mr. Whitney's room at the time. I am inclined to think that the reason of his taking the papers away was, that they might be examined between the interval of opening and closing the office."

How far those papers were taken from the office to which they belonged, by Mr. Whitney, will appear by the following question and answer, a part of which relates to that subject. (See evidence of Samuel McKean, p. 113, 9th question and answer.)

"Question. State how far the room that he [Mr. Whitney] now occupies is situated from the room of Mr. John McGinnis, jun., [from which the land-office papers were taken,] and whether, in passing from one to the other, it is necessary to go out of doors, or up or down stairs.

"Answer. To that part of the question, the room now occupied by Mr. Whitney is in the house next but one to that in which is the room occupied by John McGinnis, jun. Mr. McGinnis's room is in the third story of the building, Mr. Whitney's on the first. In passing from one to the other, it is necessary to go out of doors, and up or down stairs. If there be any communication between the buildings, without going out of doors, I have never noticed it, or known of its being used."

He adds, in conclusion, that the Secretary of the Treasury disapproved his conduct in permitting the papers to go out of his room.

The evidence contained in the responses of the clerks in the Treasury Department, and the letters before alluded to, as to the existence of the agency, and the character of the business which appertains to it, is not in any degree controverted or impugned by the testimony of the Secretary, [Mr. Woodbury,] as far as the same is understood by the minority of the committee. It is true that many portions of his evidence are so elaborate and argumentative as not to be intelligible without taking it all together, and bestowing upon it some considerable consideration. In page 12 of the journal he thus describes the nature of the agency and the character of its duties and business:

"But in several other cases where the Department has not been consulted by the banks in any way, to my knowledge, except in the letter of 1833, before given, but where the banks had been selected, some before and some since my entering on the duties of Secretary, I have no doubt that they appointed an agent here at an early day after their selection, and that they did it from a conviction that he might be useful to them in both their public and private duties as banking institutions. Some of the banks are so situated, as to their extensive capital and discounts, their heavy business in exchanges, their large deposits, payments, and transfers, that it is manifest to all acquainted with such operations, as stated in the above letter, addressed to my predecessor, and in my reply of November, 1834, before annexed, that an intelligent agent or correspondent here might often prove very useful and convenient, both in respect to their business in behalf of the Treasury, and the business with the commercial community, as well as with each other, while, in cases differently situated, an agent here would be of little or no benefit whatever.

"In answer to the next question, I know nothing with accuracy beyond what has already been stated, as to the duties he is to discharge for those banks which employ him. But I presume, as just intimated, it is to communicate the earliest information on all subjects he may suppose to affect their interests, whether as public depositories or private banking institutions; to give his advice and aid when called for or deemed useful in the transaction of their business of either character; to be the organ, at times, of presenting their wishes to the Department in respect to subjects connected with their public obligations; and to procure here, and communicate, the best intelligence in his power, on the state of the money market at home or abroad, on the condition of the currency and of the exchanges, and on the supposed legislation likely to happen in Congress, either as to the banks themselves, or as to heavy appropriations to be paid by them; and, in fine, on any other topic which he may consider interesting or beneficial to his employers."

In page 14, Mr. Woodbury, in answer to the question, "What official or unofficial connexion existed between said agent and the Treasury Department?" replies, at great length, in his eleventh answer, which extends through three or four pages of the journal, from which it will be seen that Mr. Whitney is recognised as the agent of the deposit banks, and business is transacted with him in the same manner that it is with agents and attorneys in fact, who have full power from their principals to bind them in the settlement of claims, the execution of acquittances, receipts, &c.

Page 15.—"Of the present resident agents who occasionally transact business with the Department, I understand that two of them, Mr. Causten and Mr. Law, keep their offices in their houses, and two of them, Mr. F. Dickens and Mr. Whitney, keep their offices in the same row of buildings now occupied by the Treasury. But it is presumed that the two last persons hire their rooms of the private owners of the buildings, as the Department has done since the fire in 1833, and as neither of these agents has hired them from this Department."

"With all of those agents before named, [he having before given a list of agents,] as well as many others, when transacting business for their principals, the official connexion of the Department has, in all other respects as well as these, been similar, and the manner of transacting business has been similar, except as the business may differ in amount, extent, or difficulty, and requires in some cases much more frequent and constant attendance and inquiries than in others.

"My anxiety has always been, in concerns so very numerous, and involving, as many of them do, not only such difficult questions for decision, but such large amounts of property, to furnish every proper facility to each, every species of public information connected with their respective business, and every access to papers pertaining to their cases, which might be deemed useful to the principal in interest, and at the same time not injurious to the Government.

"But in the case of the agent of the banks no indulgence of any kind is known or believed to have been granted, which, if requested, has been withheld from the agents on other subjects, and especially the agents of corporations, or persons in public employment, nor any withheld which, in other like cases, has on request been granted.

"I can think of no further explanation desirable as to the official connexion between the agent for some of the deposit banks and this Department, unless," &c.

Pages 36 and 37 of journal of committee.—"Question 14. Have you ever consulted or advised with said R. M. Whitney upon the propriety or expediency of measures, or informed him of measures respecting the public money and the deposit banks, before or after such measures were adopted or rejected by the Treasury Department? if so, is the practice of so advising and consulting with, and of so informing him, habitual with you, and upon what measures have you consulted and advised with and informed him?"

"Answer. I have not been in the habit of consulting Mr. Whitney on the propriety or expediency of measures, or informed him of measures respecting the public money and the deposit banks, except in cases where he first applied to have any measure adopted or changed, which he represented to have a material bearing on the deposit banks he represented, and in which cases I have, of course, asked him, if he did not voluntarily state them, his reasons in favor of his request.

"On the topics of the public money and the banks generally, he has often, of his own accord, offered his views, as other persons have who have taken a particular interest in those subjects; and I have always, when they have been so offered by him or others, endeavored to weigh properly the facts and arguments offered, and I have frequently felt obliged to differ in opinion from him as well as others on such topics. Sometimes, also, I have inquired as to particular facts or events connected with the exchanges or banking, both of Mr. Whitney and others, whether merchants, bankers, or men of practical intelligence, on such subjects, but have done it with a view, in all cases, to inform myself fully and accurately, before deciding on any pending question or measure, and, in several instances, have written to a distance for such information, when not able to procure what was satisfactory here."

Page 40 of journal of committee.—"Question 19. Have you ever authorized, or directed, or requested R. M. Whitney, or other agent of the deposit banks, to issue or give instructions, directions, requests, or information of any kind, by circulars or otherwise, to land or other receivers of the public money, or to any other officer or officers, agent or agents, of the Government?"

"Answer. That it [the Treasury Department] urged on the banks, their officers and agents, whenever seen or consulted in respect to the topic, a general correspondence and agreement to redeem their notes, when taken for public lands, at the places most desirable to give them a uniform and high value as a currency; and, at the same time, promised any aid or facility in the power of the Department, consistent with its duties in other respects to the Government, to promote so desirable an object; and, on one occasion, when it was understood that a circular was preparing and printing to advance this object by the agent, and the Department was asked for its approval of this course in behalf of the deposit banks, and its willingness to frank that printed communication on this public and interesting subject, when addressed to the public officers and agents, whose duty it was, according to long usage and frequent orders from the Department, to conform to the arrangements of the banks as to the matter, I have a strong impression that I assented to both; certain it is, I should feel justified in doing it, under the practice and views long existing in the Department.

"I have never conferred any authority, in any way, on this subject, on any person other than is above stated; I have never conferred any on Mr. Whitney, except the assent above mentioned, when he proffered to act as agent for some of the deposit banks, and always regarded any power, properly exercised by him in respect to it, as one derived merely from the banks themselves, in his capacity as their agent.

Page 50, journal of committee.—"Question 22. Have you ever consulted or advised with Reuben M. Whitney upon the selection of banks of deposit of the public money?"

"Answer. I remember he has in some cases offered his remarks to me on the subject, as have other persons.

"Question 23. What was the character of the remarks, reasons, or considerations, submitted to you by said Whitney, for the selection of banks of deposit, in the instances he offered his remarks to you? Were such remarks, reasons, or considerations, of a political party character? and if so, state in what respect.

"Answer. I have no doubt the persons making those communications have, in some cases, mentioned political circumstances in connexion with this subject, and in general as opposed to the propriety of the selection. A majority of the stockholders and officers have usually been stated to be, when any thing was said in respect to their politics, opposed to the view of the administration. I have no recollection of any particular remarks of a political character made by him or others on this point, beyond such ones as are above described, and those in only a very few cases."

Page 52, journal of committee.—"Question 24. Are there any communications in writing from any agent or agents of the deposit banks, or others, urging directly or indirectly upon the Department the selection of particular banks of deposit, from political considerations; if so, to whom, and by what agent or agents addressed?"

"Answer. There are none, to my knowledge, from Mr. Whitney; on the contrary, it is due to Mr. Whitney to state, as before intimated, that, when speaking of the political views of the stockholders of most of the deposit banks, he has, if knowing their political opinions, and mentioning them, often observed, that though they were opposed in general to the opinions of the administration, he thought the present system of State depositories should be administered on principles similar to what I have before described, as to fitness, locality, and security of the banks selected, and the fiscal wants of the Department, and without any reference to the politics of their officers and proprietors."

Mr. Woodbury disclaims all political influence in the selection of depositories of the public money. To place this part of the case in its true light, and show whether Mr. Whitney is entitled to the compliment bestowed upon him by the Secretary, the minority beg leave to refer particularly to a letter, written by said Whitney to James C. Wilkins, Esq., of Natchez, Mississippi, president of the Planters' Bank, a depository of the public money, for which said Whitney is agent, commencing

"WASHINGTON, Sept. 30, 1835.

"DEAR SIR: When I wrote you last I did not inform you that it had been represented here that you were, or would be, the candidate for the Senate, in opposition to Walker. This I then considered was a tale for the purpose of operating prejudicially to the interest of the Planters' Bank, got up by some one who was striving to direct a part of its Government agency to another institution."

(See pages 99 and 100. See, also, at pages 101 and 102, the correspondence of said Whitney with John D. Beers, of New York, and also the correspondence between John Tillson, one of the directors of the State Bank of Illinois, then applying to become a deposit bank, and said Whitney.)

Mr. Tillson offers Mr. Whitney a salary, and wishes to be informed what course the Secretary of the Treasury has taken in reply to the letter of Mr. Ridgley, the cashier of the Illinois Bank. Mr. Whitney, in reply, says he will be candid—says strong prejudices exist, and serious charges are made against that bank. The first charge is as to the violation of its charter, &c., and that the ultimate object of those who control the bank is to effect a political change in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, in opposition to the principles of the present administration. He refers to the charter of the bank to sustain the charge of violating its charter. He refers to the list of stockholders, shows that some of them reside in Cincinnati, and that they are connected with the Life and Trust Company, &c. He further adds:

"And it has been declared that, in the late election in Illinois, the bank did employ its influence in the Sangamon district. Of the result of this election, you will probably have noticed an extract of a letter of Governor Duncan, which has gone the rounds of the opposition press. With such charges as these, and such grounds for their belief, I must say that I shall feel it a duty to do all in my power to discourage the selection of any institution as a confidential agent of the Government, at any personal pecuniary sacrifice whatever.

"I hope the Illinois Bank will be able to show the whole to be founded in error," &c.

This appears to have been the commencement of the correspondence between that bank and the Treasury Department, which resulted in the failure of the bank to obtain the deposites. An abstract of said correspondence is herewith submitted, which was made out from various letters obtained from the Department by a member of a sub-committee, Mr. Wise, which was appointed at his instance to visit the Department, examine the correspondence of the same with the deposit banks, and cause copies of any papers to be sent, which any one of them considered important. The urgent and pressing business of two committees, of one of which he was chairman, prevented Mr. Wise; and the constant attendance on this committee of the other two gentlemen, Messrs. Martin and Johnson, prevented them from devoting more than a few hours' time to the examination which resulted in the discovery of the above correspondence with the Illinois Bank, of which the Secretary of the Treasury had given the committee no particular information. Had sufficient time been allowed, much more important evidence might have been obtained by a strict examination into the Treasury Department. For a further illustration of the political and party considerations which have been relied on by the banks in obtaining the public money, as well as in using it after it has been obtained, the minority would beg leave to refer to the correspondence with the Burlington Bank, State of Vermont, an abstract of which is herewith submitted.

From the testimony of James Schott, president, and William D. Lewis, cashier, of the Girard Bank, it appears that the said Whitney gave information in advance of the intended issuance of the Treasury circular of July 11, 1836, requiring specie in payment for public lands, or at least that such a measure was under consideration before the adjournment of Congress.—(See the president's answer, at p. 151, to 13th interrogatory; see the answer of the cashier, at p. 155, to 13th interrogatory.)

Answer by the cashier. "I was apprized by Mr. Whitney of his belief that such a measure was under consideration, but do not know that he derived his knowledge thereof from the Treasury Department, or any such persons as are mentioned in this interrogatory; and being at Washington about the beginning of July, his impressions were confirmed by my own observations. The information was given as a matter of intelligence coming within the sphere of the agent's duty, and for no specific purpose. Nor do I know that any specific use was made of such information, so far as relates to any written correspondence upon the subject. I refer to my answer to the 3d interrogatory."

The minority of this committee would respectfully call particular attention to this fact, that during the session of Congress a measure involving the exercise of such doubtful powers on the part of the Executive; a measure which the Secretary of the Treasury declined to adopt, until, as he informs the committee, he was so directed by the President; and one so materially affecting the currency, the exchange, the whole moneyed concerns of the country, and consequently the trade, commerce, and value of every species of property of the people of the United States—that this measure, which had been rejected by the Senate, should be decided on before the adjournment of Congress, which was left in profound ignorance of its existence, while Mr. R. M. Whitney was not only in possession of this cabinet secret, but was actually communicating it to his distant friends "as a matter of intelligence coming within the sphere of the agent's duty," cannot but arrest the attention of the most careless as well as the most prejudiced mind.

As to the third subject of inquiry: "What compensation does said agent receive?" the minority cannot report the precise amount of compensation which he received directly from the banks, according to express stipulation; much less can they state the amount of his indirect emoluments and profits, which he receives in consequence of his agency.

The said Whitney stood mute before the committee, and refused to answer upon this as well as upon most of the other subjects of inquiry.

The Secretary of the Treasury states that he is wholly ignorant as to the amount of his compensation, and adds that "each bank which employs him, and pays him any thing, pays whatever it deems reasonable and proper."

The witness (F. P. Blair) says at page 119 of journal: "Witness states that he once inquired of Mr. Whitney what compensation he received. He gave him an answer which satisfied the witness that he did not choose to let him know the amount of compensation. He said the banks made him such return as they thought his services deserved. He had no fixed salary, as the witness understood. This was some time ago, soon after his agency commenced."

Thus it will appear how profound is the secret and mystery which covers this transaction, when the agent, R. M. Whitney, conceals the facts from his friend, F. P. Blair, who, it appears from his own evidence, is interested in knowing the amount of said Whitney's compensation, as he is the special bail as well as the security for the prison bounds for said Whitney for a large amount, he (Whitney) being notoriously insolvent. The same witness (F. P. Blair) says, in same page of the journal:

"He thinks he has learned from some quarter that Mr. Whitney is agent for about twenty banks, but is not positive as to the source of his information, nor does he know their names."

It appears from the evidence that several banks pay him one thousand dollars each per annum, that several pay him five hundred each per annum, and that several pay him lesser sums each per annum, besides several sums which have been paid to him at different times in the form of a bonus. Some of the deposit banks, for which he is understood to be agent, have not made their returns to the interrogatories of the committee. Some have taken the high ground assumed by their agent, and refuse to communicate any information whatever upon the subject. But it appears from the evidence that he has received from three banks in New York, viz: Mechanics' Bank, Bank of America, and the Manhattan Company, each one thousand dollars per annum; from the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank, Albany, New York, seven hundred and fifty dollars per annum; from the Union Bank, Baltimore, five hundred dollars per annum; from the Girard Bank, Philadelphia, five hundred dollars per annum; Moyamensing Bank, Philadelphia, three hundred dollars per annum; Farmers and Mechanics' Bank, at Hartford, Connecticut, one hundred and twenty-five dollars per annum; Burlington Bank, Vermont, two hundred dollars per annum; Commercial Bank at Cincinnati, including its branch or office of discount at St. Louis, one thousand dollars per annum; Farmers and Mechanics' Bank in Michigan, two hundred dollars per annum; in all, six thousand five hundred and seventy-five dollars per annum, besides a bonus of one thousand dollars from the Girard Bank, and the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars paid by the Franklin Bank at Baltimore, which bank does not employ him as agent.*

* The annual compensation received by said Whitney, from all or most of the old deposit banks, commenced on the 1st of January, 1835.

To what amount his direct compensation may be increased by the evidence yet to be received from those deposit banks which employ him, and which have not yet forwarded to the committee their testimony, the minority will not undertake to conjecture.

The minority of this committee, believing it to be their duty to ascertain whether such agent did not derive the large amount of his profits or emoluments by and through speculations in the public lands, Treasury certificates, the stock of banks, &c., supported the following interrogatory, offered by Mr. Peyton, as proper to be propounded to all witnesses examined in behalf of the committee, viz:

"7th. State whether said agent or agents, in connexion with any officer or officers of the Government, or any other person or persons, company or companies, have or have not been engaged, either directly or indirectly, in speculations in the public lands, in Treasury certificates of deposit, since the issuance of the Treasury order of July 11th, 1836, or in the stocks of banks, corporations, &c., and whether such speculations have or have not constituted a part of the compensation or emolument of said agent or agents of the deposit banks."

"Mr. Hamer moved to amend by striking out 'any officer or officers of the Government, or,' which was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

"AYES—Messrs. Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer, Martin.

"NOES—Messrs. Garland, Wise, Johnson, Peyton."

The witness, R. M. Whitney, refused to answer the following interrogatories during his examination before the committee, (page 88, question 39:)

"39. Did you or did you not communicate intelligence, in advance of the issuance of the said order, [circular of July 11th, 1836, requiring specie in payment for public lands,] to any person or persons at a distance, who were engaged in speculation in the public lands, stocks, or money market?"

"Answer. I decline giving any answer to this interrogatory."

"41. Have you, or not, become a stockholder in any of the deposit or other banks, since you have been acting as agent for some of said deposit banks; and did you acquire or procure said stock as part of your compensation, or in any other manner by or through your agency for said banks?"

"Answer. I decline giving any answer to the interrogatory."

"44. Did or did not one or both of the deposit banks in Michigan make a loan or loans to a very large amount, say fifty or one hundred thousand dollars, more or less, to a company or companies of land speculators, since you have been an agent for some of the deposit banks? If yea, state whether you used your influence in that or any similar instance, either for a land or stock company, person, or corporation, to procure accommodations at any deposit bank; and state whether you were to derive, or have derived, in any such case, any profit, benefit, or emolument whatever."

"Answer. I decline giving any answer to the interrogatory."

"45. What compensation do you now, or have you heretofore, and are you hereafter to receive from each one of the deposit banks for which you are agent?"

"Answer. I decline giving any answer to the interrogatory."

"47. State whether you, in connexion with any other person or persons, company or companies, have or have not been engaged, either directly or indirectly, in speculations in the public lands, in Treasury certificates of deposit, since the issuance of the Treasury order of July 11th, 1836, or in the stock of banks, corporations, &c., and whether such speculations have or have not constituted a part of your compensation or emolument as agent of the deposit banks.

"Answer. I decline giving any answer to this interrogatory."

"48. Have you, in connexion with any officer or officers of the Government, or any other person, since July 11, 1836, drawn specie from the banks of deposit of the public money, under the pretext of its being necessary for the public use, upon Treasury warrants or drafts, which specie was used for your or their profit as merchandise, and not applied to the public use, but the notes of the banks, or their equivalent, used instead of such specie, for the public use; or in any manner have you been concerned in speculations, on, by, or through said Treasury certificates, warrants, or drafts, in connexion with any person, bank, or corporation?"

"Answer. I decline giving any answer to this interrogatory."

"49. Have you been concerned in speculations in the public lands, or the stock of banks or corporations, in connexion with any officer or officers of the Government, or other person or persons, company or companies, bank or banks; or have you used your influence to obtain for such officer or officers, person or persons, company or companies, bank or banks, facilities, loans, accommodations, &c., at any of said deposit banks, for which exercise of influence you have been compensated, either by gift, present, reward, or participation in the profits, or expected profits, of any such speculation?"

"Answer. I decline giving any answer to the interrogatory."

"51. Look upon the list of deposit banks, now before you, say whether it contains the names of the whole number, and point out on the list the banks for which you are agent."

"Answer. I decline giving any answer to the interrogatory."

When the said Whitney first appeared before the committee, on the 12th day of January, 1837, in obedience to its summons, he requested a week's delay to prepare, as it was understood, his papers, &c., called for in the subpoena duces tecum. The request for that purpose was considered reasonable by all the committee; but as the time allowed for the correspondence with banks remotely situated from the seat of Government was quite limited, it was desirable that he should communicate to the committee such information as was necessary to enable them, without delay, to commence a correspondence with the deposit banks; and, on motion of Mr. Peyton, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That the witness be again called before the committee, and that the following interrogatories be propounded to him, to wit: the first, second, third, and fourth, before its decision on the application of said witness for a week's delay."

"1st. Have all or any of the deposit banks, to your knowledge, employed an agent or agents, to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business with the Treasury Department? If so, who is the said agent or agents?"

"2d. What are the number, names, location, &c., of the banks for which he or they is or are agent or agents?"

"3d. Have such agents in all instances carried on their correspondence directly with the officers of said banks, as well before as since the commencement of their agency, so far as you know?"

"4th. State the names of the officers, as well as the offices which they respectively hold, with whom your correspondence has been carried on with said banks at all times."

"Answer. I am not prepared, at this time, to answer any interrogatory whatever, touching the subject the committee is investigating, excepting such as are clearly and positively of a public nature, and in no way connected with private affairs."

"Answer to 1st interrogatory. Considering this interrogatory as concerning my private affairs, I decline at this time giving any further answer."

"Answer to 2d interrogatory. Beyond what concerns me personally, I have no knowledge."

"Answer to 3d interrogatory. The same as to the second."

"Answer to 4th interrogatory. The same as to the first."

To enable the committee to understand the facts, and form a correct judgment whether the interrogatory which related to the employment of an agent by the deposit banks, "to transact their business with the Treasury Department," "concerned the private affairs" of the witness, the following interrogatory was propounded, by the unanimous consent of the committee, (p. 22:)

"5th. What is the nature and character of the business which such agent as has been referred to in the question to witness is employed to transact with such banks; what relation has it to the public money in the Treasury or deposit banks; and was he or they employed at the instance, by the request, or with the consent, of the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other officer of that Department; and is or is not the business and correspondence of that Department with the deposit banks carried on through said agent or agents? And let witness further state whether the agent derives his pay or emoluments out of the deposit banks or the Treasury, or both."

"Answer to 5th interrogatory. Considering all that is contained in this of a private nature, but that part as to 'whether the agent derives his pay or emoluments out of the deposit banks or Treasury, or both;' and that I believe the whole will be answered in the documents which I have been called upon to bring before the committee, when they are produced, with the exception of that part, I decline at this time giving any further answer; and that so far as regards myself, and any agency of mine for any of the deposit banks, the only compensation or emolument which I derive, or ever have derived, has been paid me by those banks; also, that I never have received, nor do I ever expect to receive, any pay, compensation, or emolument whatever, from the public Treasury, for such agency."

Page 89 of journal of committee.—"Question 43. Did you or did you not write one or more letters to the deposit bank at Philadelphia, called the Moyamensing Bank, giving certain information of a public nature, and making suggestions of a general and public nature, bearing upon the legislation of Congress, among other things; and, in conclusion, did you not mark said letter as confidential, and intimate heavy penalties in case of a disclosure? State whether you have ever written letters of that character to any of the deposit banks."

"Answer. I decline giving an answer to this interrogatory."

To W. D. Lewis, cashier of the Girard Bank, page 228.—"Question 6. Does or does not the correspondence, copies of which you have heretofore, in your testimony, and still decline to lay before the committee, between yourself as cashier of the Girard Bank and R. M. Whitney as agent of that bank, relate to the public money in or out of said bank, its use, the expected use of the same? And state, further, whether the said correspondence upon the side of said Whitney is marked confidential; and, further, whether you have reason to apprehend injury to the pecuniary interest of said bank, if you were to make a disclosure of the same."

"Mr. Pierce objected to the same, which was decided in the negative by the following vote:

"AY—Mr. Peyton.

"NOES—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Martin, Hamer."

Page 238 of the journal of committee.—"Question 25. Does or does not the correspondence to which reference has been made relate to the public money? State whether R. M. Whitney does or does not, in that correspondence, give such information, or make such suggestions, as would be important to be communicated to a bank, or individual, who wished to use the public money for purposes of speculation. Do you know any bank, person, or body corporate, which has engaged in speculation in consequence thereof? In answering this question the witness is required only to describe the correspondence, without going into its contents.

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question; it was decided in the affirmative.

"AYES—Messrs. Peyton, Wise, Garland.

"NOES—Messrs. Gillet, Hamer.

"The question was propounded to the witness, who replied as follows:

"Answer. To the latter part of this interrogatory, I reply that I have no knowledge of any bank or persons having engaged in speculation in consequence of information derived from Mr. Whitney, since he has been agent for the banks. Having declined producing my correspondence with Mr. Whitney, I decline stating any part of its contents, or the nature of it, believing that no power exists, or can exist, in a committee of Congress, to require it.

Page 254, journal of committee.—"Question 31. Has or has not Mr. Whitney expressed to you, or to any other person, to your knowledge, either verbally or otherwise, his views, or course, or his wishes, on any subject connected with this inquiry, since it was agitated, and a committee was appointed to investigate it at the present session of Congress? If yea, state the purport of the same.

"Mr. Pierce objected to this question, and it was decided in the negative.

"AYES—Messrs. Peyton, Garland.

"NOES—Messrs. Pierce, Martin, Gillet, Fairfield."

Page 256, journal of committee.—Mr. Lewis speaks of the letter and correspondence which has passed between said Whitney, as agent, and himself, as cashier, of the Girard Bank, as follows:

"They are not my property for any such purpose, and I have therefore no privilege, even were I so disposed, to permit them to go out of my possession, or to be made public. Letters of this character belong no less to the writer than to the person to whom they are addressed. I hold this position to be sound, and accordant with the dictates both of justice and honor."

The House will see the insuperable difficulties which were thrown in the way of a full investigation of this subject, by the strict and technical construction given to the resolution of the House by the majority of the committee, by the obstinate and pertinacious refusal, on the part of said Whitney, to respond before the committee, and the like course adopted by those officers of the deposit banks who were supposed to be in possession of the most important information on the subject, while acting, as it may not be unjust or unreasonable to suppose, under the apprehension of injury to the pecuniary interests of the institutions of which they were officers, if they should make full disclosure of what they knew.

Whether the inquiries contained in the above interrogatories were of that private and personal character which was contended for by the witness, Whitney, as well as the officers of some of the principal banks for which he is agent, will be for the House to determine.

The 4th and 5th branches of the resolution of the House of Representatives will be considered together; this method will avoid much repetition of the evidence, as well as contribute to a more distinct and perfect understanding of this part of the subject of inquiry before the committee. They are as follows:

"4th. Was such agent or agents employed at the request or through the procurement of the Treasury Department?

"5th. Is the business of the Treasury Department with the said banks conducted through the said agent?"

If the Treasury Department did procure the employment of said agent, it would be an encouragement to the banks to transact their business with the Department through him as their organ; and, on the other hand, if that business had been conducted through said agent, and that too under the frank of the Department, there could not be devised a better method than this to procure his employment by the banks.

How far the agent has transacted the business of the deposit banks with the Treasury Department, and whether such agent has been employed at the request or through the procurement of the Treasury Department, the minority will proceed to show by the evidence, to rely upon the testimony of any other witness than the Secretary of the Treasury, and the clerks in the Department; but inasmuch as their testimony has been stated, it will not be recapitulated.

First. Mr. Woodbury wrote, and placed in the possession of Mr. Whitney, the letter of the 5th November, 1834, which letter is a recommendation of the most imposing character in favor of Mr. Whitney, and must have been so intended by the writer of the same; it was so used by Mr. Whitney, and so viewed by the banks before whom it was laid. It should be borne in mind that about the time Mr. Whitney obtained the letter in question from the Secretary of the Treasury, he was on the eve of his departure for the Northern cities, to solicit the agency which he obtained; that he procured another recommendation on the 8th November, 1834, three days after the date of the Secretary's letter, written by one living at this city, high in the confidence of the Executive, as he, Whitney himself, says, which letter is not only a strong and decided recommendation of Whitney, as well as of the agency to be created, but the writer speaks in the most decided terms of approbation of both, in the name and on behalf of the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury. These two letters, written so near to each other in point of time, upon the same subject, were used by Whitney as letters of recommendation to the banks, which viewed them in the same light, and appointed him their agent.

Page 13, journal of committee.—"9th. In answer to the next inquiry, whether said agent has been employed at the request or by the procurement of the Treasury Department, I would observe that no such request has been made since I entered on the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury, nor have I any reason to believe that any such request emanated from my predecessors. Neither has any thing occurred, to my knowledge, which could be construed, in any degree, as contributing to procure his employment, unless, when the appointment of an agent was, in 1833, voluntarily proposed by several of the banks, to be made by the Department, it declined to make one, though coinciding in the opinion which they expressed, that one might, for some of the purposes mentioned in their letter, be at times found very beneficial and convenient to them."

It will be perceived that Mr. Woodbury does not controvert the facts that said letter did contribute to procuring said employment, and that it was so understood and intended at the time. As to the effect produced upon the officers of the bank before whom it was laid, see the following question from Mr. W. D. Lewis, cashier of the Girard Bank:

Page 239 of journal of committee.—"27. Was or was not the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, (Levi Woodbury,) bearing date 5th November, 1834, to R. M. Whitney, laid before the board of the Girard Bank, as a recom-menation, at the time he applied to be appointed agent of said bank? Was or was not that the only letter of recommendation which he laid before that bank? And state whether that letter did or did not satisfy the board that the said Whitney was acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury.

"Mr. Gillet objected to the question, which was decided in the affirmative.

"Ayes—Messrs. Wise, Peyton, Garland.

"Nays—Messrs. Gillet, Hamer."

"The question was answered as follows:

"In my replies to the printed interrogatories, I have detailed the circumstance of Mr. Whitney's appointment, and submitted a copy of Mr. Woodbury's letter referred to. Whether that was considered by our board as a letter of recommendation, I do not know. As to the Girard Bank, no recommendation of Mr. Whitney was necessary, nor was his appointment caused by that letter. For myself, I have no hesitation in saying that it satisfied me that Mr. Whitney would be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury, or at least not disagreeable to him."

"See, also, the resolution of the Moyamensing Bank, passed on the 1st September, 1835, in which this is the only letter of recommendation before the bank. The resolution speaks of Mr. Whitney as one who has been highly recommended, &c. In the resolution of the Girard Bank, passed 10th November, 1834, it is stated substantially that Mr. Whitney has heretofore communicated information which could not have been obtained from any other source, in consideration of which, it appears, he was paid one year's salary in advance of his employment—$500.

Page 111 of journal of committee. Question to Richard Ely, a clerk in the Treasury Department:

"10. Do you know of any application made by R. M. Whitney to any officer of the Treasury Department, either for a recommendation to be employed as agent for any deposit bank, or for any agency or office in that Department connected with the deposit banks?

"Answer. I do not, further than is contained in the letter of the Secretary to him, dated in November, 1834, appended to the Secretary's answer, which I have seen."

Page 243 of journal of committee. President of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank, Albany, says:

"The services rendered by our corresponding agent are, in giving attention to our interests and communications, furnishing statements concerning the condition of the deposit banks, of the currency and exchanges, with the operations of the Treasury, together with such intelligence as he may deem to be of public importance or particular interest to us."

Nos. 18 and 19, he says:

"No such letter or circular was ever received by us from any of the persons referred to, nor did said persons, or any of them, ever intimate a wish, or make a request, either by letter, circular, or otherwise, touching the appointment by us of an agent. I beg leave to state that I presume the Secretary of the Treasury has been fully aware of the existence and character of the agency established by the banks; and that, appreciating its importance, he has afforded every consistent and proper facility to enable the agent to serve the banks usefully and faithfully."

Page 247 of journal of committee. Witness, John Armstrong, states:

"Reuben M. Whitney conceived it to be his duty, which he owed to those banks that had employed him as their agent, to give them the earliest notice of the course that would be pursued by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Page 161 of journal of committee. The following is a preamble and resolution adopted by the Bank of America, New York, November 21, 1834:

"Whereas the opinion has been entertained and expressed that the interest of this bank, and the other banks in this city, as well as the interest of the commercial community, may be promoted by the employment of a suitable person, resident at Washington, to act as agent for the three deposit banks in this city, to obtain and communicate them, with the full consent and approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury; seasonable information, from time to time, on the following points, as well as other general or particular information which may be useful and proper to communicate, viz:

"The amount of revenue receivable at New York for a period of two or three months to come.

"The amount, or probable amount, of public money to be disbursed here, or the amount that the three deposit banks in New York may be called upon to pay for that purpose, and for a like period.

"The amount of public money that they may probably be required to transfer, and the time when, and the place or places where, the transfers are to be made.

"Therefore, resolved, That the president and cashier of this bank be, and they are hereby, authorized, in co-operation and conjunction with the two other deposit banks of this city, or with the presidents and cashiers thereof, to appoint such person as they may deem suitable and proper to act as agent for the purposes aforesaid, and to agree to make the said agent suitable compensation for his services; provided that the amount to be paid him by this bank shall not exceed the sum of six hundred dollars per annum."

The president of the bank states:

"And the subscriber further says, that, soon after the preamble and resolution, as above recited, were adopted by the board, R. M. Whitney was appointed the agent in conformity therewith, with the exception only that the compensation to be allowed him by the Bank of America was agreed to be one thousand dollars per annum, as was understood to be allowed by the two other deposit banks, instead of six hundred dollars, as stated in the resolution."

By reference to the correspondence of the banks at Burlington, Vermont, and at Detroit, Michigan, to which the particular attention of the House is solicited, it will appear that Mr. Whitney's employment was looked upon by those banks as a measure desirable to the Government, and one which was necessary on their part, to enable them to co-operate in carrying out the great measures of the administration. It will further appear that the business of those banks with the Department, the correspondence touching financial, fiscal, and political affairs, was carried on with Mr. Whitney; and that he not only exercised the power of procuring for them the use of the public money, but gives assurances to the Burlington Bank, on one occasion, that it shall have as much money as it can hold, (say three fourths of its capital stock,) from some time in the summer of 1836 until the following January. It will further appear that the Burlington Bank so used the money as to effect political changes, as it is stated, in favor of the administration, and urged that as a reason why that bank should be liberally supplied with the public deposits, to continue like political influence in the spring and summer of 1836.

Page 12 of journal of committee.—Mr. Woodbury's answer, part of 5th. "In two or three other cases, and those only, individual stockholders of banks have inquired of me, verbally, as to the utility of employing such an agent. In those cases they were informed that the situation and business of the banks in which they were interested appeared to be so small, and of such a local character, that they were not, in my opinion, likely to derive any very essential benefit from the employment of an agent resident here; and it is believed that they never have employed one."

Page 34 of journal of committee.—"Question 8. Is Reuben M. Whitney the person through whom all or any of the communications, verbal or written, which are or have been made by the Treasury Department, or by you personally, to the banks of deposit of the public money of which he is agent, or which are or have been made by said banks to said Department, or to you personally?

"Answer. In reply to this question, if properly understood by me, I would state that most of the communications received from the deposit banks, or made to them, are direct between them and the Department, though occasionally they are made through Mr. Whitney, in behalf of some of them. I am not aware of any letter on record, from or to Mr. Whitney, as their agent, except as named in my report of the 11th instant; though in some instances, I think, when making some request for information in their behalf, he has shown to me letters, or held them in his hand, which he said were from them.

"When the application in their behalf has been made by him verbally, and no letter has been written by them to the Department, it has been customary to make to him a verbal reply, if the business was of little importance. But if it was considered of much magnitude, a written communication has generally been sent by the Department directly to the bank concerned.

"Other persons, as remarked in my report to the committee on the 11th instant, have been the organ of communicating the wishes of several of the deposit banks, on several occasions, and in a manner similar to that above described as to Mr. Whitney."

Same page, in answer to 9th interrogatory, he says:

"All the communications made to or from the Department, whether directly or through Mr. Whitney, which have been found on record, &c., are believed to be annexed to my report," &c.

Page 226.—Wm. D. Lewis, cashier of the Girard Bank:

"Question 1. In your testimony which was forwarded to the committee heretofore it is stated as follows, to wit: 'I have on some occasions, in my personal correspondence with Mr. Whitney, availed myself of his presence at Washington to make informal inquiries of different officers of the Government, and suggestions relating to the interest of the bank; but the business communications of the bank with the Treasury Department have been direct in all cases.' Were the inquiries and suggestions above referred to of a public nature, which concerned the bank as a fiscal agent? And state what aid the said Whitney rendered in and about the same or similar business, at any time.

"Answer. They related no further to the bank, as a fiscal agent of the Government, than that, if the bank had not been a fiscal agent, the inquiries and suggestions would not have been made, and could not have arisen. I will state a case," &c.

"Since the Girard Bank has been a depository of the public money, great efforts have been made, at different times, by various banks in Philadelphia, to obtain a portion of it. I have on one or more of these occasions informed Mr. Whitney, and requested him to make it known to the Treasury Department, that if other depositories were appointed in Philadelphia, the amount of the public money left with us might not remunerate the bank for the labor and responsibilities of the duties it had engaged to perform for the Government. He made the suggestions, but I am not aware that the bank received any aid from him," &c.

Page 87, journal of committee.—"Question 32. Have you ever used the following language in any of your circular letters or instructions to any of the public officers, to wit: 'I have forwarded a copy of this to each of the public receivers, and have no doubt that they will act with such fairness that no injustice will be done to any one of the deposit banks. Should it ever be otherwise, and any one of the banks have cause to feel aggrieved, I am authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury to say that he will take the most prompt measures to remove any just cause of complaint?' If yea, state whether you had received any such authority from the Secretary of the Treasury.

"Answer. I refer the committee to my printed letter of the 29th of August, 1835, (see appendix I 2,) in which will be found the paragraph quoted in this interrogatory.

"In effecting the arrangements informed of in that letter, a fear was expressed by some of the banks that the banks and receivers might not act in perfect fairness with each other, and that some of the banks might be subject to impositions under the arrangements they entered into. I communicated the same to the Secretary of the Treasury, who, viewing, as I believed, the arrangement an important one for the community, and for the purpose, as I supposed, of inspiring the banks with confidence that they would not be imposed upon, told me I might communicate to them the substance of what is contained in the concluding part of the quotation, though probably in other words."

"Question 35. In forwarding to the public officers and to the deposit banks the before-mentioned circulars, or making any other communications to them, have you at any time used the frank of the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other officer of that Department? If yea, state if it has been your habit to do so.

"Answer. The Secretary of the Treasury franked, or authorized to be franked, two or three of the circulars furnished to the committee, marked A, one of each of which was forwarded to many, if not all, of the deposit banks, and of one of them a copy was sent to each of the receivers, also franked by him. Also, tables showing the condition of the deposit banks, which I have occasionally prepared, the character of which was, in all cases, made known to him, or the papers themselves being first shown to him. Beyond these, I do not recollect that he has ever franked, or authorized to be franked, any communications to the banks, or to any other person whatever, of mine."

The minority would particularly refer to the following extracts from the testimony of the Hon. Levi Woodbury, to prove—

1st. That there is an agent employed by some of the deposit banks to transact their business with the Treasury Department.

2d. What the description of that business is.

3d. That correspondence, containing claims, requests, and complaints, and matters of strict business, has been conducted through this agent from some of the deposit banks with the Treasury Department; that arguments are made by him to the Secretary of the Treasury, which caused the Secretary to examine important subjects critically; and that this agent has had authority conferred upon him by some of said banks, under which he acted, and declined to act, which authority was known to the Secretary of the Treasury; and that the Secretary communicated answers through this agent to the banks.

"S. 'The names of the banks employing said agent' are, with the few exceptions before alluded to, unknown to me, except by rumor.

"Besides the Planters' Bank at Natchez, and the Commercial Bank at Cincinnati, copies of whose correspondence have already been furnished, I think that in one or two cases of difference of opinion as to claims made by the banks through their agent, and in those alone, a written communication was shown to me by him, concerning the authority confided by them.

"But the final question in those cases not having been one as to competent authority on the part of the agent to do any official act in their behalf, but as to the sufficiency of the reasons in favor of the claims or requests made by him, and which are believed not to have been acceded to, it did not become necessary to ask the evidence of his authority to be filed; and no names are recollected beyond those above stated, except the Commercial Bank at New Orleans."

"44. In the cases alluded to in your report of the 11th instant, where the Planters' Bank, Natchez, and the Commercial Bank, Cincinnati, confided authority upon said Whitney, as shown to you in a written communication, what was that authority, what were the claims or requests made by him, what was the case of the Commercial Bank at New Orleans?

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question, which was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

"AYES—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Wise, Johnson, Hamer, Martin, Peyton, Fairfield.

"No—Mr. Gillet.

"Answer. The cases referred to in my report of the 11th instant, where differences of opinion occurred, and an authority was produced, but not found necessary to be filed, were those of the Commercial Bank at Cincinnati and the Commercial Bank at New Orleans. I mentioned the Planters' Bank only as one in which a general notice had been given, and was on file, as to his agency, and a copy which was annexed. The particular case of the Commercial Bank at Cincinnati was, so far as I recollect, a letter which he held in his hand and read, wishing him to request the Department to change the place to which some of the transfers outstanding against it were to be made, such as from other parts of Ohio or Kentucky, to New Orleans or Philadelphia; and stating the reasons for the request to be, that the banks in Ohio and Kentucky would probably demand specie, or be less accommodating as to the payments than those at a distance. I think it stated, further, that an extension of some of the transfers was desirable, if the Department could conveniently grant it, and complained that the time already allowed was too short. The agent also urged both these requests, assigning similar reasons, and that the time granted in several cases was less than that formerly allowed, under like circumstances, to the United States Bank, to make transfers. I declined to change the places from Ohio and Kentucky, as requested, because, under the late deposit law, I felt bound to confine to the neighborhood those particular transfers, till about money enough was placed in Ohio and Kentucky to meet their share of the anticipated division of the surplus and the current expenditures, rather than send it to a distance; but the time for some of the transfers, which seemed too short, I proposed to extend as long as seemed to me proper. He, however, declined taking such extension in behalf of the bank, unless I could make it longer, thinking it would not be useful so little extended; and, therefore, I wrote to the bank itself what had been proposed to him, and his declining it, and that I should, notwithstanding, give the extension which to me seemed suitable, and the bank, if not accepting it, might pay the money over at the time originally fixed. In respect to the Commercial Bank at New Orleans, the application by the agent was, according to my recollection, with a letter setting out that the Department had, by transfers and warrants, drawn out, or proposed to draw out, all or nearly all the public money in its possession, and wishing him to request it to revoke some of the transfers, and possibly to postpone some to a much later day if none could be revoked. I informed him that the bank must be in an error, as, before signing a transfer or sending one, I was always careful to see that it would not reduce a bank too low. I sent for the clerk who had charge of the subject, and examined into it critically, and declined to revoke any of them, as I felt satisfied that the bank and its agent considered the money the bank had been notified it would probably be called on to pay the State of Louisiana during 1837, but for which no transfers had then been issued, and which I told him would not be issued when the time of payment arrived, provided the bank should, before that time, be drawn down too low. I informed him, also, that the bank had, by mistake, included one transfer, in order to make out its case, which had never been issued, according to our records; and hence I could not revoke any that had been issued. He seemed to be satisfied that the bank was right. Whether any extensions of time were given in this case I do not remember, but know that none were given beyond the period of the quarterly payments to the States, for which purpose these transfers had been seasonably ordered."

"8. Is Reuben M. Whitney the person through whom all or any of the communications, verbal or written, which are or have been made by the Treasury Department, or by you personally, to the banks of deposit of the public money of which he is agent, or which are or have been made by said banks to said Department, or to you personally?

"Answer. In reply to this question, if properly understood by me, I would state that most of the communications received from the deposit banks, or made to them, are direct between them and the Department, though occasionally they are made through Mr. Whitney in behalf of some of them. I am not aware of any letter on record, from or to Mr. Whitney, as their agent, except as named in my report of the 11th instant; though in some instances, I think, when making some request for information in their behalf, he has shown to me letters, or held them in his hand, which he said were from them.

"When the application in their behalf has been made by him verbally, and no letter has been written by them to the Department, it has been customary to make to him a verbal reply, if the business was of little importance. But if it was considered of much magnitude, a written communication has generally been sent by the Department directly to the bank concerned.

"Other persons, as remarked in my report to the committee on the 11th instant, have been the organ of communicating the wishes of several of the deposit banks on several occasions, and in a manner similar to that above described as to Mr. Whitney."

"9. Are most or all of the communications received by you or the Department from the deposit banks, or made to them by you or the Department, directly or through Mr. Whitney, contained in your communication of the 11th instant to this committee? If not, where and what are they?

"Mr. Gillet objected to its being propounded. On the question, Shall the interrogatory be propounded? it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Wise, Johnson, Hamer, Martin, Peyton.

"No—Mr. Gillet.

"The question being propounded to the witness, he returned the following answer:

"All the communications made to or from the Department, whether directly or through Mr. Whitney, which have been found on record or on file, and which relate to his appointment or compensation as agent, are believed to be annexed to my report to the committee on the 11th instant.

"But there are numerous other communications on other subjects with the deposit banks, relating to their duties and requests, &c., both to and from them, and which probably fill several volumes, and are now at the Department."

As to the sixth and last subject of inquiry contained in the resolution of the House of Representatives, viz: "Does said agent receive any compensation from the Treasury Department?" the minority are of opinion, from the evidence, that although he does not receive directly any pay or emolument from the Treasury Department, yet it is manifest that the banks, who are depositories of the public money, and which have thereby become practically the Treasury of the Government, would not have employed and paid said agent, if they were not depositories of the public money.

Page 238 of the journal of the committee.—Question to W. D. Lewis, cashier of the Girard Bank:

"Question 22. Would the Girard Bank have any use for the agency of Reuben M. Whitney, such as said agency is now constituted, if said bank were not a deposit bank?"

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question, which was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

"AYES—Messrs. Peyton, Wise, Garland.

"NOES—Messrs. Gillet, Hamer.

"The question was propounded to the witness, who replied as follows:

"Answer. I think not."

The minority of the committee respectfully suggest for the consideration of the House in future, if it should think proper to resume the consideration of this subject, when more time can be granted for such an investigation, which will require the whole of a long session of Congress, instead of the short and inadequate period which has been allowed to this committee.

It was not until the 20th day of January that the committee adopted a resolution calling upon the officers of the deposit banks, and receivers of the public money, to forward to the committee such evidence as might be in their possession; and it was determined on the 18th day of February that the committee would take no additional testimony after that day, circumscribing the whole investigation within the time of twenty-nine days. And the committee are hurried on to make their report before any answer or communication has been received from many sources, from which important evidence was expected to be received.

That there is much important evidence which the committee have been unable to obtain, for want of time, will in some measure appear by the following extracts taken from letters received by a member of the committee from gentlemen of the first intelligence and standing.

First, from a gentleman in Philadelphia, stating that Mr. Van Wyck, cashier of the Union Bank, which is a depository of the public money at Nashville Tennessee, said in Philadelphia that when he visited Washington, on business connected with the deposit bank of which he is an officer, he called upon Mr. Whitney, laid his business before him, together with a check or bill for one thousand dollars, and on the next day he was informed by Mr. Whitney that the favors or accommodations which he sought were granted.

About the time this letter was received, on the morning of the 28th of January, the witness, R. M. Whitney, returned before the committee to file certain letters to which reference had been made by him at a previous examination, and the following questions were propounded to him by Mr. Peyton, (see page 103 of the journal of the committee:)

"Question 2. Did the Secretary of the Treasury introduce to you John Tillson, jr., when he came to Washington on the business of obtaining a deposit of the public money in the Bank of Illinois, called the State Bank, of which he was a director, and refer him to you on that subject?"

"Answer. The Secretary of the Treasury did not introduce Mr. Tillson to me, nor to my knowledge was he ever referred to me by that officer. As well as I now recollect, Mr. Tillson was introduced to me by Mr. Williams, of Cincinnati, at the time he presented the letter from J. D. Beers.

"Question 3. When Mr. Van Wyck, cashier of one of the deposit banks at Nashville, Tennessee, came to this city, some time since, on business connected with the said deposit bank, did he lay his business before you, together with a bill or check for one thousand dollars, or any other sum of money? State fully all the facts and circumstances of this transaction.

"Answer. I decline answering this interrogatory."

The witness having declined answering the interrogatory, Mr. Peyton, on the evening of the same day, proposed that several interrogatories should be propounded to Mr. Van Wyck, and forwarded without delay to the commissioners at Nashville, Tennessee; and, pending this motion, Mr. Gillet moved that the committee should adjourn; which being negatived, the vote was taken on the proposed interrogatories to Mr. Van Wyck, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Garland, Wise, Johnson, Hamer, Martin, Peyton.

"NOES—Messrs. Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet."

The following is an extract from the letter dated Nashville, February 9, 1837, to a member of the committee, from a gentleman in that city:

"It is peculiarly unfortunate that Van Wyck left this for New Orleans about the 15th of January. He stated the same here to —, and others, that he did in Philadelphia; and were it possible to get his testimony, it would be a clincher," &c.

From a gentleman in Cincinnati:

"I am under subpoena to testify in the Whitney inquiries. My information is hearsay only. The questions, as propounded, are not calculated to elicit facts and motives as they exist in the deposit banks here. Under the present questions, nothing will be obtained," &c.

On the protest of the said Whitney the minority will forbear to make any further comment than to remark that the learned counsel who drew up that protest, in which they portray and defend in such eloquent terms the sanctity of private rights, appear to have overlooked the point upon which the whole argument turns, to wit: that R. M. Whitney's agency, in transacting the business between the deposit banks and the Treasury, and which gives him the control of the public money, is not a private and individual, but a public and official employment.

The minority would earnestly call the attention of the House to the position assumed in the protest of said Whitney, as well as by several of the deposit banks, that the Secretary of the Treasury alone has the right of examining, either by himself or by his agent, into the condition of the deposit banks and safety of the public money, but that Congress has no right whatever to exercise a visitatorial or supervising power over the banks who are depositories of the public money, in any case whatever.

To illustrate the absurdity of this position, it is only necessary to suppose a case in which a Secretary of the Treasury, either from want of capacity or integrity, should give up his control, and permit the treasure of the nation to be squandered or divided out as legitimate spoils between the fiscal agents of the Government and their secret and confidential agent. In such a case as this, has not Congress the power to interpose and rescue the treasure of the country?

In the conclusion of the protest of the witness, (R. M. Whitney,) he introduces the subject of his character, his conduct during the late war, and his examination before a committee appointed to examine into the affairs of the United States Bank in 1832. (See page 79 of journal.) He says:

"I went to Canada as a clerk; I afterwards became engaged in business on my own account. When the war broke out I had a great deal of money scattered about in that country, having sold much on credit, all of which I should have sacrificed by leaving it, when war was declared. I remained, therefore, having the permission of the British Government to do so. I took an oath to obey the laws of the country while I remained there."

The witness having thus voluntarily made an issue as to his character and conduct, the minority will submit a brief statement of the facts, without comment.

In the minority report of the bank committee, at page 307, it is stated:

"There was one occurrence during the transactions of Thomas Biddle & Co. with the bank which merits particular notice.

"An informer and witness by the name of Whitney, who had formerly been a director of the bank, was produced, who declared, upon oath, that in May, 1824, two of the cashiers of the bank had informed him that Thomas Biddle & Co. had been in the habit of drawing money out of the bank on a deposit of stock in the teller's drawer, without paying interest, and that the president of the bank has discounted two notes, one for Thomas Biddle & Co. and one for Charles Biddle, without the authority of the directors. This witness stated that he went with these officers of the bank, and examined the teller's drawer and the discount book, and found the facts which had been stated to him verified by the examination. He also stated, to give additional certainty to his averments, that he made a memorandum at the time, with the dates of the transactions, which memorandum he produced to the committee. Having thus unalterably fixed the date of the transaction, as if by some fatality he went on to say that he immediately proceeded into the room of Mr. Biddle, the president, and remonstrated with him against the irregular proceedings, and that Mr. Biddle promised him that they should not occur again.

"In the interval between the adjournment of the committee that day, and its meeting the next, a member of the board of directors suggested to Mr. Biddle that he was, about the time of this alleged transaction, in the city of Washington. On examining the journal of the board, and the letter-book, it was found, by entries and letters, that for several days previous to the alleged interview between the president and Whitney, and for several days afterwards, the president was absent on a visit to this city, on business of the bank, and General Cadwalader was acting as president in his place. Thus was this artfully devised story, which was intended to blast the reputation of a high-minded and honorable man, through one of those extraordinary interpositions by which Providence sometimes confounds the contrivances of the wicked, made to recoil upon the head of its inventor, who must forever stand forth as a blasted monument of the speedy and retributive justice of Heaven."

The following resolution was unanimously adopted by the committee, a majority of whom were the political friends of said Whitney, and three of that majority, to wit: Messrs. F. Thomas, of Maryland, C. C. Cambreleng, of New York, and Col. R. M. Johnson, of Kentucky, are now members of the House of Representatives:

"Resolved, That the charges brought against the president, of lending money to Mr. Thomas Biddle & Co. without interest, and of discounting notes for that house, and for Charles Biddle, without the sanction of the directors, are without foundation; and that there does not exist any ground for charging the president with having shown, or manifested any disposition to show, any partiality to those individuals, in their transactions with the bank."

The following questions were propounded to said Whitney, when examined before that committee in 1832:

"Question by Mr. Watmough. How long have you been a resident of this country?

"Answer. I was born in this country.

"Question by same. Were you not a resident of Canada during the late war?

"Answer. I resided there from 1808 to the spring of 1816, when I removed to this city.

"Question by Mr. Adams. In what place in Canada did you reside during the late war?

"Answer. In Montreal. I went to Canada as a clerk. I afterwards became engaged in business on my own account. When the war broke out, I had a great deal of money scattered about in that country, having sold much on credit, all of which I should have sacrificed by leaving it when war was declared. I remained, therefore, having the permission of the British Government to do so.

"Question by same. Did you ever ask permission of the Government of the United States to remain there?

"Answer. I never did.

"Question by same. On what conditions did the British Government permit you to remain in Canada during the war?

"Answer. I took an oath to observe the laws of the country while I remained there.

"Question by same. Did you understand that to be an oath of allegiance?

"Answer. No; I did not, permanently."

The committee adopted the following as the 29th interrogatory:

"At the time he [Whitney] was so designated, were you acquainted with him personally; and was he favorably known to you, either for capacity or integrity?

"To this interrogatory some of the officers of the bank responded favorably to said Whitney. And one of them, (Philip Riley,) a director in the Moyamensing Bank of Philadelphia, responded unfavorably to his character."

The following interrogatory was proposed by Mr. Peyton, to be put to Chief Justice Taney, (page 146.):

"Question 5. At that time, was Mr. Whitney known to you? If yea, was he favorably known to you for capacity, as well as integrity?

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question; which was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

"AYES—Messrs. Garland, Wise, Peyton.

"NOES—Messrs. Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer, Martin."

And the question was not propounded to Mr. Taney, notwithstanding it had been to other witnesses.

"Do you know Reuben M. Whitney's general character for truth and veracity; and would you believe him on oath, when strongly tempted to swear falsely?

"Mr. Hamer objected to this question; and it was rejected."

Questions of a like nature, embracing the general character for honesty and veracity, were propounded to many other witnesses, and rejected.

The following questions were propounded to Wm. D. Lewis, cashier of the Girard Bank:

Page 223, Question 7.—"In your last answer you say that, so far as your personal knowledge extends of Mr. Whitney, it is favorable to his character for capacity and integrity. Will you be good enough to say how far your personal knowledge does extend? Do you know R. M. Whitney's general character as an honest, trustworthy man? If yea, is that general character good or bad?

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question; which was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

"AY—Mr. Peyton.

"NOES—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Gillet, Fairfield, Martin.

"Question 8. Are you or are you not acquainted with the general moral character of R. M. Whitney?

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question; which was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

"AY—Mr. Peyton.

"NOES—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Martin.

"Question 9. Do you or do you not know, from information of a general nature, that said Whitney was one of the British commissaries during the late war in Canada? Has he not the reputation of having been the keeper of a gambling-house or faro bank in Philadelphia, since he returned to the United States? Has he not been guilty of many dishonest practices to defraud his creditors; and is he not notoriously a bankrupt, and at this time living in luxury and splendor in the prison-bounds of this city?

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question ; which was decided in the negative, by the following vote :

"AY—Mr. Peyton.

"NOES—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Martin."

For further evidence of the character of said Whitney for veracity and integrity, reference is made to the evidence and letters of Chief Justice Taney, and other witnesses, and papers herewith reported to the House. For the fact that he is a bankrupt, now in the prison-bounds of this city, with judgments against him for damages to the amount of ninety-five thousand and twenty-one dollars, ($95,021) with suits now pending to the amount of $5,700 in the court of this District against him, reference is made to the extracts from the records herewith filed, (exhibit W.) For the fact that he has been guilty of dishonest practices to defraud his creditors, reference is made to the examination of R. S. Cox, Esq., the attorney who has had the management of many claims against him.

The minority of the committee cannot conclude their report without calling particular attention to the fact that, after said Whitney was discharged from his examination before the committee, the anonymous letter of the 8th November, 1834, which was enclosed by him as a recommendation of himself to the Bank of Burlington, Vermont, of which he says: "I herewith enclose you a letter written by one living here, high in the confidence of the Executive," was sent to the committee by said bank.

A motion was made by Mr. Peyton that the said Whitney be re-summoned to appear, and state on oath who was the author of that letter. The proposition was negatived by the committee, as follows:

AYES—Messrs. Garland, Johnson, Wise, Peyton.

NOES—Messrs. Gillet, Fairfield, Hamer, Martin, Pierce.

Mr. Peyton presented the matter to the House, and offered a resolution directing that the Speaker issue a subpoena for said Whitney to appear before the committee of which the Hon. James Garland is chairman, to testify in relation to the authorship of that letter; which resolution was negatived in the House, by the following vote: Yeas 86, nays 97.

Mr. Peyton then offered a resolution that said Whitney be summoned to appear at the bar of the House, and testify as to the authorship of said letter; which was negatived: Yeas 76, nays 102.

There has been suppressed the author of a letter which is calculated to throw much light upon the most important inquiry contained in the resolution of the House of Representatives. But the committee would only hope that, so far as the character of the House is concerned, there was no necessity that the witness (Whitney) should stand mute, and refuse to answer the following interrogatories:

Page 81, journal of committee.—"Question 4. Have you held conversation, consulted, or advised, with any member of this committee, or of the House of Representatives, as to the course you should or should not pursue?"

"Answer. This, like the last interrogatory, I consider entirely of an inquisitorial character; yet I will nevertheless answer it so far as to say that I have never held conversation, consulted, or advised, with any member of this committee, as to the course I should or should not pursue.

"Question 5. In the answer just given you refer only to members of this committee. State if you have ever held such conversation, consultation, or been advised, by any member of the House of Representatives, as to the course which you should or should not pursue, in your examination before this committee.

"Mr. Gillet objected to this question; which was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

"AYES—Messrs. Garland, Martin, Peyton, Johnson, Wise.

"NOES—Messrs. Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer.

"The question being propounded to the witness, he replied as follows: I stated that I considered the last interrogatory altogether of an inquisitorial character, though I subsequently answered a part. I consider this interrogatory, also, altogether of an inquisitorial character, and decline answering it.

"Question 6. Did any member of this committee, or House, give any advice, assistance, or opinion, in relation to the drawing up the protest, as filed by you to-day, or to the propriety or impropriety of your making such protest?"

"Answer. This interrogatory I view as altogether of an inquisitorial character, and decline giving any answer.

"Question 7. Has any member of this committee, or of the House of Representatives, read, or heard read, or been informed of, the contents of the protest which you have this day filed, before it was filed?"

"Answer. This, like the last interrogatory, I consider inquisitorial, and therefore decline answering it."

At page 90 of journal of committee, said witness states, in answer to a question of Mr. Hamer:

"No member of this committee has given any advice, assistance, or opinion, in relation to drawing up my protest, whatever. Ever since the committee was appointed, I have, from motives of delicacy, studiously avoided holding conversation with any member of it."

In accordance with the foregoing facts and views, the minority submit to the House, as they submitted to the committee, the following resolutions, as the conclusion to which they have been brought, by the evidence before them.

BALIE PEYTON.

HENRY A. WISE.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 22.

Mr. Wise proposed seven resolutions, and moved the first as a substitute for Mr. Pierce's first resolution:

1st. Resolved, It is the opinion of this committee, and it finds the facts to be so, from much of the testimony of several witnesses, that several of the deposit banks, how many is not ascertained in evidence, and whether by joint or several contract does not clearly appear, have employed an agent, to reside at the seat of Government, to transact certain business for them with or at the Treasury Department, as described in the various testimony before the committee; and that in most of the cases Reuben M. Whitney is their agent, who resides here permanently, and who has his office in the same block of buildings occupied by the Treasury Department, and that other agents have, in the like manner, in some instances, been temporarily, if not permanently, employed, by some of the deposit banks.

This was put to the vote, and decided in the negative, as follows:

AYES—Messrs. Wise, Johnson, Peyton.

NOES—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer, Martin.

The question then being on the adoption of Mr. Pierce's first resolution, it was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

AYES—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer, Martin.

NOES—Messrs. Wise, Johnson, Peyton.

Mr. Wise moved the 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th of his resolutions, as substitutes for all the others of Mr. Pierce.

The following are the resolutions:

2d. Resolved, That, in the opinion of this committee, the character of the business which such agent or agents are so employed to transact is generally described in the following letter from officers of certain deposit banks to the Hon. R. B. Taney, Secretary of the Treasury, (see exhibit A, page 17 of the printed journal, as published in the former part of this report,) and in the testimony of Mr. Woodbury, as contained in his reply to this committee of January 11, 1837, to wit:

"Some of the banks are so situated as to their extensive capital and discounts, their heavy business in exchanges, their large deposits, payments, and transfers, that it is manifest to all acquainted with such operations as stated in the above letter addressed to my predecessor, and in my reply of 5th November, 1834, before annexed, that an intelligent agent or correspondent here might often prove very useful and convenient, both in respect to their business in behalf of the Treasury, and their business with the commercial community, as well as with each other."

In answer to the next question, "I know nothing with accuracy beyond what has already been stated, as to the duties he is to discharge for those banks which employ him. But I presume, as just intimated, it is to communicate the earliest information on all subjects he may suppose to affect their interest, whether as public depositors or private banking institutions; to give his advice and aid when called for or deemed useful in the transaction of their business of EITHER character; to be the organ, at times, of presenting their wishes to the Department in respect to subjects connected with their public obligations; and to procure here and communicate the best intelligence in his power on the state of the money market at home and abroad; on the condition of the currency, and of the exchanges, and on the supposed legislation likely to happen in Congress, either as to the banks themselves, or as to heavy appropriations to be paid by them; and, in fine, on any other topic which he may consider interesting or beneficial to his employers." And, further, that the character of the business which such agent is employed to transact is shown by some of the replies of the deposit banks, particularly that of the Bank of Burlington, Vermont, and of Michigan, Detroit.

It is further shown, by circulars franked by the Department for Reuben M. Whitney, to the deposit banks, and by those sent by him to the receivers of the public money, which are on the files of this committee, and by the evidence of McClintock Young, Esq., chief clerk of the Treasury Department.

3d. Resolved, That the committee cannot report precisely the full amount of compensation to such agent, but it has ascertained that several banks pay one thousand dollars each per annum, that several pay five hundred dollars each per annum, and that several pay lesser sums each per annum, to Reuben M. Whitney, as their agent, besides several sums which have been paid by one or more banks to him, at different times, in the form of a bonus. And it is the opinion of this committee that each bank which employs said Whitney pays him whatever it deems reasonable and proper.

4th. Resolved, (as the opinion of this committee,) That no such agent was employed at the request or through the procurement of the Treasury Department whilst the Hon. Wm. J. Duane or the Hon. R. B. Taney was at the head thereof, as appears by their letters, as given in evidence by them and the witness, Reverdy Johnson, Esq.

That, after the Hon. Levi Woodbury was appointed Secretary of the Treasury, on the 4th day of November, 1834, Reuben M. Whitney addressed to him the following letter, enclosing the said letter from the deposit banks in Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, to wit:

(See exhibit B, page 19, of the printed journal, published in this report.)

That, in reply thereto, Mr. Woodbury addressed to him (Whitney) the following letter, to wit:

That Reuben M. Whitney did use and exhibit the said letter from Mr. Woodbury as a letter of recommendation to several of the deposit banks, as shown by their replies in answer to the interrogatories of this committee; that said banks themselves received and acted upon that letter as a recommendation to appoint such an agent, and as a recommendation of said Whitney; and it is the opinion of this committee that some of the deposit banks would not have appointed said Whitney their agent if said letter had not been written to him and sent to them as a letter of recommendation from the Secretary of the Treasury.

5th. Resolved, That, as to "whether the business of the Treasury Department with said banks is conducted through said agent," this committee would refer to the entire testimony of Mr. Woodbury, the correspondence of said Whitney with the Treasury Department and the banks, so far as this investigation has developed the same, to the said circulars of R. M. Whitney to the banks and the receivers of public money, and to the character of his business generally, as described by the testimony before mentioned. This committee is clearly of opinion that much of the information as to the business of the deposit banks with the Treasury is communicated through said Whitney to and from the Department, verbally and in writing.

6th. Resolved, (as the opinion of this committee,) That the several deposit banks became, by contract, before and since the act of Congress regulating the deposit of the public money, fiscal agents of the Government; that those of them which have employed an agent or agents to transact their business with the Treasury Department would not have employed or paid such agent or agents unless their fiscal relations and public obligations to the Government had existed; and though said agent does not directly receive any compensation from the Treasury Department, yet he would not be employed and paid by the banks which do employ and pay him or them, if they were not public depositors, and which have the keeping and the use of the public money upon the terms and conditions imposed by act of Congress.

7th. Resolved, That this committee refers to the entire testimony before it upon the various points of inquiry referred to it, and that the same be reported to the House.

The question being on the adoption of the above resolutions as substitutes, it was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

AYES—Messrs. Wise, Peyton, Johnson.

NOES—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer, Martin.

Mr. Wise moved his fourth resolution, with the addition, to wit: "With the exception of said letter, there is no evidence of any recommendation of said Woodbury for the appointment of said Whitney, or any other agent," as a substitute for Mr. Pierce's second; which was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

AYES—Messrs. Garland, Wise, Johnson, Peyton.

NOES—Messrs. Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer, Martin.

Mr. Johnson moved to amend the second resolution offered by Mr. Pierce, by adding thereto the following words: "Unless the letter of Mr. Woodbury to R. M. Whitney, dated November 5, 1834, in reply to the letter of the said Whitney, dated November 4, 1834, shall be construed as a recommendation of 'an agent of the deposit banks, resident in Washington, from whose services and correspondence great advantage might, in a fiscal and commercial view, be derived to said banks.'" The amendment was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

AYES—Messrs. Garland, Wise, Johnson, Peyton.

NOES—Messrs. Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer, Martin.

The question then being on the adoption of Mr. Pierce's second resolution, it was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

Agent of Deposit Banks.

AYES—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer, Martin.

NOES—Messrs. Wise, Peyton, Johnson.

Mr. Wise moved his fifth resolution as a substitute for Mr. Pierce's third resolution; which was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

AYES—Messrs. Wise, Johnson, Peyton.

NOES—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer, Martin.

The question then being on the adoption of Mr. Pierce's third resolution, it was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

AYES—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer, Johnson, Martin.

NOES—Messrs. Wise, Peyton.

Mr. Wise offered his sixth resolution as a substitute to Mr. Pierce's fourth resolution; which was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

AYES—Messrs. Wise, Peyton, Johnson.

NOES—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer, Martin.

The question then being on the adoption of Mr. Pierce's fourth resolution, it was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

AYES—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Johnson, Hamer, Martin.

NOES—Messrs. Wise, Peyton.

Mr. Wise offered his second and third resolutions as substitutes for Mr. Pierce's fifth; which was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

AYES—Messrs. Garland, Wise, Johnson, Peyton.

NOES—Messrs. Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer, Martin.

Mr. Wise then offered his first, second, and third resolutions, as substitutes for Mr. Pierce's fifth; which was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

AYES—Messrs. Wise, Johnson, Peyton.

NOES—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Hamer, Martin.

The question then being on the adoption of Mr. Pierce's fifth resolution, it was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

AYES—Messrs. Garland, Pierce, Fairfield, Gillet, Johnson, Hamer, Martin.

NOES—Messrs. Wise, Peyton.

Deposition of the directors of the Bank of Burlington, and cashier.

Answer to 1st interrogatory: That they pay Whitney at the rate of $200 per annum, commencing with the 1st January, 1835.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE BANK OF BURLINGTON.

Nathan B. Haswell, a director of said bank, to R. M. Whitney, dated BURLINGTON, July 16, 1836.

"The branch bank at this place will soon cease its operations; and, to enable us to meet the public demand, I need not repeat that a deposit of a permanent character will enable us to continue to keep our bills at par, as above stated, (in New York and Boston,) and meet the wants of the people in this section of the country.

R. M. Whitney to N. B. Haswell.

WASHINGTON, July 27, 1835.

"This, it was found, could not be done under the existing laws, [Treasury appoint an agent,] but it was suggested that all the advantages could be derived by each bank appointing its own agent, provided each selected the same individual, which could accrue to the banks themselves, and to the Treasury Department, in case the agent was appointed by that Department." * * *

"A central agency, for the purpose of intercommunication, has been found, thus far, productive of great benefit to the public."

R. M. Whitney to N. B. Haswell.

WASHINGTON, August 8, 1835.

"I intend to see the Commissioner of Pensions, and recommend to him to place the money in the hands of the branch banks only about as fast as they will want it to pay out, so as to give the use of it to you as long as possible," &c.

"I want to see the Bank of Burlington engage more extensively in the domestic exchange business," &c.

R. M. Whitney to N. B. Haswell.

WASHINGTON, August 21, 1835.

"In a few days I shall prepare a circular," &c. * * *

"The same will be forwarded to all the land offices. This will lead to the receipt of your notes by all the public receivers."

"I am particularly anxious that the deposit banks should turn their attention to that branch of business," [domestic exchange.]

R. M. Whitney to the president of the Bank of Burlington.

WASHINGTON, January 23, 1835.

"With this I forward you the copy of a letter written by a person residing here, high in the confidence of the Executive, to some friends in New York and Boston. This will explain to you more fully the object of the agency, and the duties which will appertain to it."

Extract from the letter above referred to, which is not signed.

"The President and Secretary of the Treasury, I know, view the subject in the same light that I do, and will be gratified if the bank will establish such an agency; and from his talents, experience, and fidelity, no appointment would be more acceptable to them than that of Mr. Whitney, who has already been recommended to the Department." [Query. Is not this Amos Kendall?]

President of the bank to R. M. Whitney.

BURLINGTON, February 12, 1835.

"Your letter dated the 23d ult. is received, on the subject of an agency of the deposit banks. I have communicated the same to our board of directors, and am instructed to say that in all business transactions with the Government they have and wish to meet their views, and do the public business intrusted to them to their satisfaction.

"So far as this institution may be profited by an agency, as it respects business, public or private, they will cheerfully pay a sum commensurate to such advantages."

Cashier of the Bank of Burlington to R. M. Whitney.

BURLINGTON, March 10, 1836.

"We are informed that the Mechanics and Farmers' Bank, located in this place, are making a movement, through various channels, to obtain the payment of pensions, and to perform the duties of a deposit bank." *

* * * "It was chartered to take the place of the branch here, and is under the direction of those who were the managers of the branch—the same cashier—and occupy the same house. Those gentlemen have not yet forgotten their mortification in having the business of the Government taken from them, and probably feel no little desire to retrieve their characters, if possible." * * * *

"The information which I received, in relation to the designs of the Mechanics and Farmers' Bank, came from Washington. Nothing of the kind is intimated here. I wish you, therefore, to ascertain if it is correct, and, if so, to apprise the honorable Secretary of the character of the applicants."

Cashier of the Bank of Burlington to R. M. Whitney.

BURLINGTON, January 25, 1836.

"Being located in the same place where a branch of the United States Bank was established, and as we are a deposit bank where the branch has discontinued its operations, the public seem to expect that we would at once afford the same facilities and accommodations that they enjoyed when the branch was doing business. There has been, on the part of our directors, a desire to meet this expectation; and the consequence has been that a very sensible change has taken place, politically, in favor of the Government; and as it is our desire to strengthen these sentiments, we feel that it is important to afford to our farmers and merchants, the coming spring, a pretty extensive accommodation, especially about the time of the wool clip." * * * "My wish is that you would have an interview with the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of allowing the present amount to remain, or, rather, that the warrants in favor of the pension agent should not be made upon the deposit for the next payment," &c.

R. M. Whitney to the cashier of the Bank of Burlington.

WASHINGTON, March 18, 1836.

"I called upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and went to the Commissioner of Pensions, and can assure you that you have nothing to fear from the effort of your neighbors. No other bank will be employed by either department, unless compelled to do so by the legislation of Congress. Mr. Everett, a member from your State, has been trying to have the pensions paid in another quarter, (Windsor, I suppose.)

"You need not fear but I will look after and protect your interest."

R. M. Whitney to the cashier of the Bank of Burlington.

WASHINGTON, August 23, 1835.

"As it may be important for you to know, as a guide in your operations, I can state to you that, until January next, I feel confident you may safely calculate upon the Treasury deposits being kept up to the maximum of what your bank can hold; say three fourths of the amount of capital."

CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE STATE BANK OF ILLINOIS.

From the Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

December 14, 1835.

"As you request that part of it may be considered as confidential, and other parts of it be communicated to third persons with whom this Department has no official connexion, and as much of it relates to subjects on which the Department has opened no correspondence, or asks for any explanation," &c.—all returned.

"But as to any other, whether of a political and party character, or otherwise, as they have had no influence with the Department, and have not been inquired about by me, it will not be necessary to offer to me any remarks."

To CASHIER State Bank of Illinois.

STATE BANK OF ILLINOIS,

SPRINGFIELD, January 7, 1836.

"I have had the honor to receive your communication of the 14th ult. I addressed you the letter to which it is a reply, under the impression that Mr. Whitney held an official station in your Department, with which was connected a supervision, under, you, of the interests of Government, as connected with the deposit banks. Under this erroneous impression, I considered his letter to Mr. Tilton as official in its character; and as it contained charges against this bank of a political and even party character, I deemed that, the subject being thus opened, there could be no impropriety in my referring to those charges in a communication to yourself. I regret the misapprehension, and I hope it will be a sufficient apology for a course which I certainly would never have taken, had I known, as I now do, that Mr. Whitney is not connected with the Treasury Department."

N. H. RIDGELY, Cashier.

From T. W. Smith to the Secretary of the Treasury.

EDWARDSVILLE, June 22, 1835.

"The stock has fallen, by (what I do not hesitate to say) means the most disreputable and dishonest, into the hands of a combination of some eight or ten individuals of Cincinnati, St. Louis, and this State, composed of the friends of the United States Bank, and deadly foes to the present administration, who will use their influence and that of the bank, which has in its direction but one friend of the administration, in favor of the recharter of the United States Bank, and adverse to every fair measure of the Government."

N. Raney to the Secretary of the Treasury.

ST. LOUIS, June 24, 1835.

"The Bank of Illinois, in a few days, will go into operation; and as an agency from Cincinnati has been established in St. Louis, to receive the public funds, &c., I deem it a duty to state that the great body of the stockholders of the Illinois Bank are red-hot opponents to the administration, and have elected for the cashier of the mother bank the chief clerk of the United States Bank of St. Louis; and such being the fact, I think their paper should not be received in the land offices, and, consequently, the agency here being compelled to take it at its nominal value.

"It has been very much the case, that several individuals who oppose the administration in this country have received the public patronage."

Wm. L. May, Representative in Congress, to the Secretary of the Treasury.

SPRINGFIELD, (ILLINOIS,)

July 20, 1836.

"At the last session of the Legislature of the State, the proposition to create the present [State] bank was brought forward by the friends of the administration, with the view to aid the Government of the United States in its fiscal operations, and to supply the place of the branch of the United States Bank.

"Your annual report to Congress had no small influence, and to it may be ascribed, in a great measure, the triumph of carrying the bank." Adds: "It was natural that the stockholders should wish to share, to some extent, the advantages to be derived from the custody of the public money.

"This favor, it is thought, our State has some reason to expect; she has always been foremost in sustaining the measures of the administration; but this, it is conceded, would not constitute a claim to the custody of the public money. When, however, to this is added an ability on the part of the bank to meet all its liabilities, and when the high standing, talents, and integrity of its directors are considered, it is thought that the State Bank of Illinois ought to be entitled to the utmost confidence."

John Reynolds, Representative in Congress, to the Secretary of the Treasury.

BELLEVEILLE, July 24, 1835.

"The bank [Illinois State] has now commenced its operations under favorable auspices, and such organization as warrants the conclusion that the confidence of the United States will not be abused. As measures, looking at the promotion of golden opinions in favor of the present and future administrations of the United States, in this State, I should say none more happy in its influence could be devised. The officers are, many of them, believed to be for the success of the distinguished candidate for the presidency. But the measures alluded to, of themselves, independent of personal predilections, I should think, would do much to advance the views of the administration. Should your Department deem it expedient to direct the reception of the issues of the bank at the land offices merely, this alone would be productive of great advantages to the friends of the administration, as a measure unequivocal to be pointed out, indicating the most friendly relations." * * * "Should these or other views cause the adoption of these measures, no doubt need be entertained of a most decided and beneficial influence in behalf of the administration."

William Kinney to the Secretary of the Treasury.

MOUNT PLEASANT, October 14, 1835.

"I have no doubt of that institution [State Bank of Illinois] having been chartered, by the influence of a designing man, for the sole purpose of speculation, both in pecuniary and political matters; and if the public deposits are placed therein for any length of time, I should not be surprised if the conduct of that institution, ere long, should be such as to throw sand into the eyes of the present administration and its true advocates.

"All that I would wish to say further is, to advise great precaution in relation to making deposits in Western banks, especially those which have lately sprung up." *

* * "I am the friend of the present administration in all its features."

Samuel Roberts, receiver of public money, Danville, Illinois, to the Secretary of the Treasury.

LOUISVILLE, November 29, 1835.

"In regard to the application of the State Bank, I think proper to inform you that the president and nearly all of the directors of the principal bank, all the cashiers of the branches, and an immense majority of the branch directors, have been the most decided opposition men to Gen. Jackson, to his measures, and his friends and supporters. The cashier of the principal bank was an officer of the United States Branch Bank at St. Louis; and I believe that the Bank of Illinois is, at this time, under the dominion of federalism.

"I think it due to you to give you this information, because I have recently learned that a different representation has been made to the Department, and no doubt with a view to produce a different impression. I know most of the directors and officers personally, and have made inquiry as to the politics of those I do not know. While the bank continues in the hands and under the control of the federal party, I hope it may not receive any patronage from the Government."

[No answer by the records.]

Secretary says the principal charges are: 1. That the stock was not properly distributed. 2. That State has no interest, and therefore charter not legal. 3. The bank has issued large amounts of paper, and not redeemed as expected.

Wm. L. May, Representative in Congress, to the Secretary of the Treasury.

WASHINGTON, January 29, 1836.

"The safety of the bank is only matter of opinion; but I cannot, in justice to my own feelings, omit the present opportunity of expressing my entire confidence in the integrity and ability of its board of directors, as well as the capacity of the bank to meet all its liabilities."

John Reynolds, member of Congress, to the Secretary of the Treasury.

WASHINGTON, January 29, 1836.

"To make the Bank of Illinois a depository of the public funds, and the paper of the bank land-office money, would be very acceptable to the people; and, from all the information I can procure in relation to its solvency, I conclude it would be a safe depository. Therefore, I do fully recommend the measure to make the State Bank of Illinois a depository for the public funds, and the paper thereof land-office money."

John M. Robinson, Senator, to the Secretary of the Treasury.

WASHINGTON, January 30, 1836.

"To your communication of the 25th instant, asking my opinion whether the selection of the Illinois Bank would be useful and acceptable to our community, and safe to the Government, I have to reply, I have no doubt but it would be both useful and acceptable to that community. As to the safety of the Government funds, my information upon that part of the subject is very limited, the bank having only been in operation a short time, and its location being in a different part of the State from where I reside. With many of the directors I am personally acquainted, and have the highest opinion of their integrity and financial ability."

W. L. D. Ewing, Senator of the United States, to the Secretary of the Treasury.

"In reply to your inquiries, I have no hesitation in saying that the deposit of the public funds in the State Bank of Illinois would not only be useful and acceptable to the people of Illinois, but is confidently expected by them." *

* * "This expectation had a controlling influence with the Legislature in the establishment of the bank."

"I believe the institution is ably and prudently conducted. I have the utmost confidence in the integrity and honor of the officers having the management of it. I believe the public funds would be as safe as in any bank west of the mountains. I have no doubt of the constitutionality of the charter."

CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE SEVENTH WARD BANK OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

Walter Bowne, president of the Seventh Ward Bank, New York, to R. B. Taney, Secretary of the Treasury.

NEW YORK, October 2, 1833.

The services of the Seventh Ward Bank are respectfully offered to the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury.

The directors feel much confidence in this application, being, (without exception,) as well as the stockholders, with few exceptions, friends of the administration.

It is also respectfully recommended to your notice that, at the time of the distribution of the stock of this institution, the commissioners awarded no portion to the brokers in Wall street. This excited their indignation against the bank, and engendered a resolution (passed at their board) that they would not deal in the stock, either directly or indirectly; and the members of their board bound themselves to abide by such resolution, on pain of exclusion.

The directors having the highest personal consideration for General Jackson, respectfully request the Secretary to lay this letter before the President.

WALTER BOWNE, President.

NEW YORK, December 16, 1833.

We, the subscribers, officers and directors of the Seventh Ward Bank, in the city of New York, friends of the administration and of the revered chief at the head of the Government, do solicit a portion of the fiscal patronage of the United States Treasury for the Seventh Ward Bank; the terms are those most favorable to the Government.

December 31, 1835.—The Secretary of the Treasury writes to George Newbold to suggest some mode of dividing the balances in the deposit banks in the city of New York, and requests him to consult the other deposit banks in the city on the subject.

The presidents of the deposit banks in the city of New York to the Secretary of the Treasury.

"The measure suggested in your communication, that the present selected banks should make suitable arrangements with the other local banks here, to leave balances with them for a limited period, or until Congress, by some act, shall render it necessary or proper to call for the whole or part of those balances, meets our entire and cordial approbation," &c. * * *

"The arrangements with the other banks, that we should propose and desire, would be such as are liberal and equitable, having a due regard to the entire safety of the funds, and to a prompt repayment thereof when required or called for; and we should accordingly deem it proper that security should be given by those banks that would be ample and satisfactory." * * *

"In regard to the question of security to be given by those banks, we may remark that, although we are quite satisfied that most of them are perfectly good, and their corporate responsibility abundantly sufficient, and we have no reason to believe but that all of them are so, yet there are many considerations that seem to render it proper that they should give additional suitable security; and if you shall be of that opinion, and will so express it in your instructions to us, it would evidently facilitate the arrangement, and render them the more ready to give the security, inasmuch as sensibilities might otherwise be awakened by the supposition that there is a want of proper confidence and liberality on our part."

CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE FARMERS AND MECHANICS' BANK AT DETROIT, MICHIGAN.

* FARMERS AND MECHANICS' BANK,

DETROIT, February 23, 1835.

SIR: The temporary absence of the president of this bank has prevented an earlier reply to your communication of the 23d ultimo.

This bank desires to co-operate with the Treasury Department in its measures for the general good; and, with that view solely, the proposition received from you will be acceded to in due time, or so soon as, by the terms of its charter, the proper step can be taken. In the mean time, it is hoped and expected that you will act as if the arrangement had been concluded. I need not assure you that the board will justly estimate and reward the attention which the interests of the public and of the institution may receive at your hands. Yours, &c.

JOHN A. WILLIS, Cashier.

R. M. WHITNEY, Esq.

From R. M. Whitney to John A. Willis—March 18, 1835.

SIR: I had the pleasure of receiving your letter of the 23d ultimo a few days since. I shall communicate to you every thing whereby I think the interests of the bank will be promoted, with the same readiness as if final action had taken place upon my proposition.

I have got the heads of the various Departments to furnish an estimate of the probable sums and periods which they will call for money from the Treasury, as well as the States in which it will be required. This will enable me to lay out a course of operations for the next six months of the Treasury with the deposit banks, whereby I can inform each the sums they will be called upon to pay or transfer during that period, on account of the Government; which information will enable them to proceed with security in the employment of the money while it remains in their hands.

R. M. WHITNEY.

JOHN A. WILLIS, Esq.,

Cashier Farmers and Mechanics' Bank, Detroit.

Agent of Deposit Banks.

From same to same—April 20, 1835.

SIR: I understand that the Secretary of the Treasury is about to issue a circular to the selected banks, making the following inquiries, viz:

1st. Whether the banks now issue notes of a less denomination than five dollars.

2d. Whether the bank (in case it now makes such issues) will be willing to discontinue any further issues of any notes of a denomination less than five dollars, after the 3d day of March, 1836.

3d. Whether the bank will also be willing to discontinue the issue of any note of a denomination less than ten dollars, at any early future day.

4th. If so, the terms upon which the bank is willing to come under such agreement.

It is, in my opinion, very desirable that the selected banks, generally, should express a willingness to enter into such an arrangement. Besides aiding the Government in restoring a metallic circulating medium, for the purposes of all the small transactions of society, and thus producing great good to the community, I think it will lead to causing all the banks which unite in carrying out this measure to obtain increased and extended popularity, &c. * * *

The considerations which the selected banks ought to require, in case they consent to discontinue the issue of all notes under five, and then under ten dollars, I think ought to be something like the following:

1st. That the Government shall not receive in payment notes of a denomination less than five dollars after the 30th day of September, 1835, nor any note of a denomination less than ten dollars after the 1st day of July, 1836.

2d. That interest shall not be required of them upon the public moneys while remaining on deposit in their hands; the duties which are now performed under the contract with the Treasury Department, and the surrender of the advantages growing out of the right to issue and circulate notes for sums less than ten dollars, being considered a full equivalent for the use of the public money.

3d. Provided that Congress shall not impose, through legislation, onerous conditions, or make of the banks injurious exactions.

In 1816, both Messrs. Webster and Sergeant opposed all legislation touching the regulation of the currency. They contended, then, that the Secretary of the Treasury had command of the currency and exchanges of the country, and could employ it more beneficially than any body or every body else. My own observation satisfies me that they were right. I think it would be well that the board of directors of each bank should give an expression of their opinions touching this subject.

I think it would be agreeable that the banks should fix the 1st day of October, 1836, for the period of discontinuing the issue of all notes less than ten dollars.

R. M. WHITNEY.

To the CASHIER of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank, Detroit.

From the same to same—July 16, 1836.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 4th instant came to hand this day, with your draft on the City Bank at Albany for $100, for balance of my salary on the 1st instant.

I notice your remarks respecting the time required to convert the funds received for land sales with available funds at New York, and have spoken to the Secretary of the Treasury upon the subject. It is his wish to do nothing in the way of transfer which will cause you the least inconvenience.

R. M. WHITNEY.

JNO. A. WILLIS, Esq.

From the same to same—July 17, 1835.

DEAR SIR: I notice by your return of the 1st instant, that your specie was reduced to $12,882 01. This, I presume, was caused by payments made to disbursing agents of the War Department. I would remark that it is desirable to avoid, as far as possible, the reduction of the specie fund of the deposit banks so low.

R. M. WHITNEY.

JNO. A. WILLIS, Esq.

From same to same, (extract)—May 30, 1836.

"These considerations, collectively, induce me to suggest, and even to recommend, to all the deposit banks which receive deposits of the public money from the land receivers, to forthwith give them notice that they will not, after the receipt of that notice, receive from them, and place at the credit of the Treasury, any thing else than, silver and gold, and the notes of such banks as will redeem such notes as are received in payment of public lands in the cities of New York and Philadelphia."

"Any steps which you and any of the deposit banks may take for carrying into effect the suggestions I have made, I feel confident will be approved by all sound financiers; and I am fully persuaded that their adoption will not only prove beneficial to the deposit banks, by relieving them, in part, of an onerous duty, but will prove most salutary in its consequences to the public in general," &c.

R. M. WHITNEY.

JNO. A. WILLIS, Esq.

From same to same—July 7, 1836.

DEAR SIR: I duly received your favor of the 22d ultimo, covering your check payable at the Phoenix Bank, in New York, for one hundred dollars, due me the 1st instant; for which please accept my thanks.

The Indian department, I have just learned, have issued requisitions for $65,000, payable in Detroit, in specie. They will, between this and the 1st of September next, require from six to seven thousand more, of which two hundred thousand must be in specie. I shall know more about the subject to-morrow.

Yours, truly,

R. M. WHITNEY.

JOHN A. WILLIS, Esq.

From the same to same—July 8, 1836.

DEAR SIR: You will be informed by the Treasury Department that the Indian department will have occasion, between this and the 1st of October, for from seven to eight hundred thousand dollars at Detroit; and Mr. Harris informed me yesterday that he should want from two hundred to two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of the amount in specie. To meet this, it has occurred to me that you will have to send abroad for specie. I have therefore thought proper to inform you that gold in almost any quantity can be had at the Bank of America, at New York, which has been received from France, and is under the control of the Treasury Department; and I would recommend that the two deposit banks at Detroit unite together and send to New York, and obtain two or three hundred thousand dollars, with which to meet the wants of the Indian department. It will be good policy for the banks to do so, as it will be aiding in carrying out one of the permanent measures of the administration—that of circulating gold.

If you should conclude to adopt these suggestions, please inform me, and I will obtain such instructions as will enable you to obtain the gold without difficulty.

Yours, truly,

R. M. WHITNEY.

JOHN A. WILLIS, Esq.

From same to same—Extract from a letter dated July 26, 1836.

"DEAR SIR: * * * There is about four million dollars arrived, and to arrive, of the French indemnity money, which the Government wish to have distributed throughout the country; and it is expected that the deposit banks will lend their aid in doing it."

R. M. WHITNEY.

JOHN A. WILLIS, Esq.

FARMERS AND MECHANICS' BANK,

DETROIT, July 8, 1835.

SIR: Your circular letter of the 25th ultimo came duly to hand. As this bank now furnishes complete lists of all banks whose notes it receives in deposit for sale of public lands, embracing all in credit north of the Potomac and Ohio rivers, and all Southern banks redeeming in New York and Philadelphia, no misapprehension can possibly exist on the subject; nevertheless, it is the determination of the bank to lend its feeble aid to perfect the great plan adopted by the Treasury Department, having for its object the equalisation of the currency. It has not, at present, an emission of notes of the denomination of $50, or over; but having recently ordered one, it will soon be able to comply with the terms of your proposition. Some little time will be necessary to make the arrangements in New York; until which, I cannot inform you at what bank the notes will be redeemed. Permit me to suggest that the deposit banks be instructed peremptorily to present at the office redeeming in New York such notes only as are actually received for sales of land, as the extension of the rule to all receipts at their respective counters would be productive of great embarrassment to banks remote from the point in question.

JOHN A. WILLIS.

R. M. WHITNEY, Esq.

From same to same—Extract from a letter dated July 24, 1835.

"DEAR SIR: I hasten to reply," &c. "Our specie shall be increased instantly; the diminution can be accounted for in a manner, doubtless, satisfactory," &c.

"We intend to be well protected below, and to prepare for any emergency that can possibly arise. I enclose a draft for $100 on New York, for your salary to the 1st instant." J. A. WILLIS, Cashier.

R. M. WHITNEY, Esq.

Extract from a letter dated August 19, 1836, from Mr. Whitney to Mr. Willis.

"DEAR SIR: I am this day favored with yours of the 10th instant," &c. * * * "He [meaning the Secretary of the Treasury] has informed you, in the circular to which I have referred, that the payments may be made at an earlier period than specified in the transfer warrant. If you should at any time wish them extended, for your own convenience or that of the public, it can be done." &c.

R. M. WHITNEY.

J. A. WILLIS, Cashier.

FARMERS AND MECHANICS' BANK,

DETROIT, January 4, 1836.

DEAR SIR: I annex my draft for $100, to pay your salary to 1st of January. I believe this is right. I hardly need say to you that, of the very large receipts on account of land sales, more than nine tenths consist of uncurrent money, which it requires over sixty days to convert, and at great risk and expense. These considerations, undoubtedly, have great weight with the Department, and will cause the transfer drafts to be made more gradually than if the deposits were available at once.

I am, dear sir, truly yours,

JOHN A. WILLIS,

Cashier Farmers and Mechanics' Bank.

Copy of Mr. Taney's letter to Mr. Thomas Ellicott.

WASHINGTON, October 22, 1836.

MY DEAR SIR: I have only a moment to say to you that Whitney's proposition is entirely unauthorized by me, and that I have no concern whatever with it: and, moreover, if all the selected banks were to recommend it, I would not appoint such an agent at this time, nor until I have more time to examine into its propriety. Certainly there will be none until Congress decide what measures are to follow the removal of the deposits; and, if one should ever be selected, I am not committed to appoint Mr. Whitney. I am perfectly at large for a selection.

Very truly, yours,

R. B. TANEY.

THOMAS ELlicOTT, Esq., Baltimore.

Copy of Mr. Taney's letter to Reverdy Johnson.

WASHINGTON, October 24, 1833.

MY DEAR SIR: Although the time for closing the mail is almost at hand, I hope I yet have time to thank you for your friendly letter, and to assure you that I perfectly agree with you in the opinions you express about the reported appointment. My private letter to Mr. Ellicott has, I hope, been shown to you, and will remove any suspicion that I could have countenanced the plan. In the first place, there is no law authorizing the establishment of such a bureau, and it would be the grossest and most indefensible usurpation of power, if I presumed to make such an appointment. I never, for a moment, have dreamed of committing such a folly; yet the imposing form of the papers given to Mr. Ellicott, coupled with the publication in the Standard, was well calculated to create the apprehension that I was participating in this wild scheme. But if I had authority, even by act of Congress, (and nothing short of an act of Congress would authorize it,) to establish such a bureau in my Department, rest assured it would not be given to the person you name. I believe he has been much wronged; but it is one of my fixed theories in politics, that a man must not only be qualified for the office he fills, but the public, who must have an interest in it, must be satisfied of his fitness, or at least must not have made up their minds against him. And whatever may be the qualities of the person in question, his appointment to that office would, under existing circumstances, be received, I am sure, with one general, universal feeling of disapprobation, by friends and foes; and, rely on it, I will never mortify my friends by such a usurpation of power, nor by such an injudicious appointment, where I have a lawful right to fill an office. The whole proceeding has been the indiscreet act of the party himself, and wholly unauthorized by me.

Again thanking you for your kind letter, I am, very truly, your friend and obedient servant,

R. B. TANEY.

Copy of Mr. Whitney's letter, referred to.

WASHINGTON, August 29, 1835.

SIR: I have the pleasure to inform you that, since my circular to you, of the 25th June last, I have received communications from the greater part of the deposit banks, upon the subject of redeeming such of their notes in New York and Philadelphia as may be received on deposit from receivers of proceeds of public lands, as well as receiving from such receivers the notes of such of the deposit and other banks as redeem the same either in New York or Philadelphia; and I am now enabled to communicate to you the arrangements made with the following banks, viz:

Bank of Burlington, Burlington, Vermont.—This bank redeems its notes of all denominations of five dollars and upwards, unlimitedly, at the Merchants' Bank in the city of New York. It also receives on deposit the notes of such banks as are at par, either in New York, Philadelphia, or Boston.

Mechanics and Farmers' Bank, Albany.—This bank redeems all its notes of the denomination of fifty dollars and upwards, unlimitedly, at the Merchants' Bank in the city of New York. It also receives the notes of all banks which are at par in New York or Philadelphia.

Bank of America, New York.—This bank will receive the notes of all the deposit banks situated north and east of that city, of the denomination of fifty dollars and upwards, on deposit, from deposit banks, which they may have received from the receivers of sales of public lands.

Mechanics' Bank, New York.—This bank will receive the notes of the two deposit banks in Boston, (the Commonwealth and Merchants,) they having arranged with this bank to redeem the same, of all denominations of five dollars and upwards.

Girard Bank, Philadelphia.—This bank will receive from all the deposit banks the notes of any and all the deposit banks north and east of Philadelphia, which they may receive from the public land receivers, of the denomination of fifty dollars and upwards.

Union Bank of Maryland, Baltimore.—This bank redeems its notes unlimitedly, in New York, at the Merchants' Bank, and in Philadelphia, at the Philadelphia Bank; and it receives on deposit, and in payment of all dues, the notes of all good banks which are redeemed in those cities.

Bank of the Metropolis, Washington.—This bank redeems its notes unlimitedly, in Philadelphia, at the Girard Bank, and in New York, at the Bank of America, Mechanics' Bank, and the Manhattan Company. It receives on deposit the notes of all such banks as are at par in either of those cities.

Bank of Virginia, Richmond.—This bank redeems its notes unlimitedly, in Philadelphia, at the Girard Bank and the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank, and in New York, at the Mechanics' Bank and Manhattan Company. It receives the notes of all banks, above the denomination of ten dollars, which redeem their notes in either of the above cities.

Bank of Augusta, Augusta.—This bank redeems, at the Bank of America, in New York, such of its notes as may be received by the receivers of proceeds of sales of public lands.

Union Bank of Louisiana, New Orleans.—This bank will redeem, at the Merchants' Bank, in New York, all its notes which may be received by the deposit banks, in payments on account of the Government. It will receive on deposit, from the receivers of public lands, the notes of all such deposit banks as cause them to be redeemed in New York or Philadelphia.

Commercial Bank of New Orleans, New Orleans.—This bank will redeem, at the Bank of America, in New York, such of its notes as may be received by deposit banks for all payments made on account of the Government. It will receive on deposit, from the receivers of public lands, the notes of all such deposit banks as redeem the same in New York or Philadelphia.

Planters' Bank, Natchez.—This bank has, in no instance since it became a selected bank, refused to receive from a public receiver a note of any one of the deposit banks. It will continue to receive on deposit, from the public receivers, the notes of each and all deposit banks, without regard to their location.

Union Bank, Nashville.—This bank issues but few notes which are not made payable, upon their face, either at Philadelphia or New Orleans. It will receive, in payment of all dues to the Government, the notes of all deposit and other banks, which redeem the same either in New York or Philadelphia.

Commercial Bank, Cincinnati.—This bank will redeem, at the Girard Bank, in Philadelphia, all its notes of the denomination of fifty dollars and upwards, which may be received by any deposit bank, to be placed to the credit of the United States. It will receive on deposit, from public receivers, the notes of all such deposit and other good banks, at Cincinnati, and its agency at St. Louis, as redeem the same in New York or Philadelphia.

Clinton Bank, Columbus.—This bank will redeem, at the Phoenix Bank in New York, all its notes of the denominations of fifty dollars and upwards, as may be received by any deposit bank from the public receivers. It will receive on deposit, from the public receivers, the notes of all such deposit and other good banks as redeem the same either in New York or Philadelphia.

State Bank of Indiana, Indianapolis.—This bank will redeem, at the City Bank in New York, any of its notes of the denominations of fifty dollars and upwards, which may be received by any deposit bank, from the public receivers. It will receive on deposit, from the public receivers, the notes of all such deposit and other good banks which redeem the same either in New York or Philadelphia.

State Bank of Indiana, Richmond Branch.—This bank will redeem, at the Bank of North America, in Philadelphia, and the Merchants' Bank, in New York, all such notes, of the denominations of fifty dollars and upwards, as may be received by any deposit bank from the public receivers. It will receive from the public receivers the notes of all such deposit banks as redeem the same either in New York or Philadelphia.

Bank of Michigan, Detroit.—This bank will redeem, in the city of New York, through their agents, Messrs. John Ward & Company, all such of its notes, of the denominations of fifty dollars and upwards, as may be received by any deposit bank from the public receivers. It will receive from the public receivers the notes of all such of the deposit and other good banks as redeem the same either in New York or Philadelphia.

Farmers and Mechanics' Bank, Detroit.—This bank will redeem, at the Bank of America, in New York, all such of its notes, of the denomination of fifty dollars and upwards, as may be received by any deposit bank from the public receivers. It will receive from the public receivers the notes of all good banks north of the Potomac and Ohio rivers, and of such Southern banks as redeem the same in New York or Philadelphia, of the denominations of twenty dollars and upwards.

Merchants and Manufacturers' Bank, Pittsburg.—This bank will redeem, unlimitedly, such of its notes as may be received by any deposit bank, from the public receivers, at the Commercial Bank in Philadelphia. It will receive on deposit, on public account, the notes of all such deposit or other good banks as redeem the same in New York or Philadelphia, of the denominations of twenty dollars and upwards.

These arrangements have been entered into with the understanding and full reliance that each bank will act towards the other in fairness, and with the most sacred fidelity; that no one will call upon any other to redeem their notes which have not been received from the public receivers, or in payment of public dues, in cases where the banks have extended the limitation that far.

I have forwarded a copy of this to each of the public receivers, and I have no doubt but they will act with such fairness that no injustice will be done to any of the deposit banks. Should it ever be otherwise, and any one of the banks have cause to feel aggrieved, I am authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury to say that he will take the most prompt measures to remove any just cause of complaint.

It is expected by all the banks which have come into the arrangement, that when one forwards for redemption, at the places named, the notes of any other bank, it will, at the same time, inform such bank the amount which it has thus sent forward.

I would suggest that, in case any one of the deposit banks which have not entered into this arrangement shall hereafter do so, they communicate the terms, &c. to me, that the same may be communicated to the others, as well as to the public receivers.

As it will greatly increase the security against counterfeits, I would suggest that each deposit bank which has or may enter into this arrangement forward to each of the other deposit banks, and to each of the public receivers, the signatures of their respective presidents and cashiers. For this purpose, I forward with this a list of the public receivers, with the places of their residence.

I am, very respectfully, your most obedient servant.

EXECUTIVE ADMINISTRATION.

Views of the majority of the Committee on the Administration of the Executive Departments.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 3, 1837.

Mr. WISE, from the committee appointed on the 17th of January last, to inquire into the condition of the Executive Departments, &c., made the following REPORT:

The select committee of the House of Representatives, to which, on the 17th January, was referred to the following resolution, viz:

“Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the ‘condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation,’ be referred to a select committee of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said departments, or their bureaus or offices, or any of their officers or agents, of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured and impaired the public service and interest; and that said committee, in its inquiries, may refer to such periods of time as to them may seem expedient and proper,” report:

That the sessions of the committee, in pursuance of this resolution, commenced on the 21st day of January, and were subsequently continued, with leave to sit during the sessions of the House, until the close of the examination of witnesses, on the 25th of February, there having been but three days, viz: the 26th of January and 8th and 11th of February, on which the committee did not meet, in consequence of imperative business requiring their attendance in the House. The sittings of the committee commenced at ten o'clock A. M. of each day, and were generally continued until four, five, and six o'clock in the evening. Twenty-eight witnesses were personally examined.

The committee state these facts in proof of the assiduity with which they have devoted themselves to the duty assigned to them by the House of Representatives, to the exclusion and almost entire sacrifice of their duties in the House; and, also, to show that, from the time occupied in this inquiry, ample opportunity has been furnished for the full development of decisive and unequivocal acts of corruption, abuse, violation, or neglect of public duty in the various executive departments, if, in truth, any such acts had been committed, or could be pointed out, through any responsible or specific source of “complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said departments, or their bureaus or offices, or any of their officers or agents, of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured and impaired the public service.”

The committee, in the outset, confidently submit it to the judgment of the House and the country, that if, in the details of a laborious investigation of thirty days, given minutely in the journal of their proceedings, with no restriction whatever to any inquiry proposed, by any member of the committee, into any specific act of abuse, corruption, violation, or evasion of law, or neglect of duty, no such act is proved, implicating the various executive departments, the only possible inference can be, that it is not proved; solely because it does not exist.

To assume as the basis of grave charges, which, if true, ought to lead to the impeachment of the President and the heads of the executive departments, that acts of corruption, abuse, and violation of law exist, but cannot be proved, and thence to argue that the administration of the Government must be corrupt, from the very failure to prove vaguely alleged abuses, by any species of evidence known to the laws, is so utterly at war with the rights of the citizen, the genius of our institutions, and the safeguards of the constitution, that it would seem to the committee that no justly balanced mind can for a moment draw such an inference from the results of this investigation. The representations made in the House, when this investigation was called for, at so much cost of time, labor and expenditure, diverted from the public business, and the allegations of corrupt violations of official duty, before the committee, must be regarded in the nature of an impeachment of the President and the heads of the various executive departments.

The committee can view this form of inquiry, instituted by the resolution referred to them, in no other light than a preliminary measure to ascertain whether there were sufficient grounds to justify a process of impeachment.

The power of the House to institute an inquiry of this kind into the conduct of the Executive, directly personal in its application, can nowhere exist, unless it be an incident of “the sole power of impeachment,” which is given to the House of Representatives by the constitution. This power extends to the President, and all civil officers of the United States, on charges of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. Such, in effect, were the representations upon which the resolution creating this committee was founded, and the necessity of its adoption urged before the House. Such is the nature of the allegations formally put upon the journal of the committee by the mover of the resolution in the House, the chairman, viz: “charges of violation of duty; of corrupt violation of duty; in abusing legal authority; in corrupting and subsidizing the public press; in retaining corrupt and fraudulent officers in place, knowing of their malfeasance and malversation in office; in appointing and paying agents of various descriptions; in making unjust and exorbitant allowance for services to political favorites; in paying a Treasury warrant which was gambled away by a disbursing officer; in allowing an account which had virtually been disallowed, and then paying it after its allowance had been forged, without causing the offender to be prosecuted; in speculations on the offices of the Government, and on the public property; in interfering with the proceedings of Congress in an improper manner; turning a deaf ear to complaints against dishonest and corrupt subordinates, and permitting inferior officers to hold their offices under the President, after they had been proved to be guilty of dishonest and corrupt practices.”—(See pages 14, 15, and 42, of the journal of the committee.)

These are the general allegations, constituting, if proved, matter of impeachment for “high crimes and misdemeanors;” and that the committee do not misapprehend the import of these allegations, is inferred from the statement of the chairman, when under oath as a witness before the committee, (page 15 of journal,) viz: “I have been informed of, and believe, much more matter of accusation and complaint against most of the heads of the executive departments; but they have never confided to me any of their secrets, and, therefore, the most I know is not of my own knowledge. If half of what I have been informed was or had been known to me personally, some of the heads of departments would have been impeached before this moment.” If I did not apprehend the strength of the executive departments to be too overpowering for inquiry itself, much more for trial, they would be impeached at all events.” This appears to the committee to be a direct affirmation that the object of the “inquiry” contemplated in the resolution moved by the author of that affirmation, and referred to this committee, was to investigate matters of impeachment.

It follows, therefore, that the only constitutional power under which the House of Representatives, as a co-ordinate branch of the Government, could constitute a committee to inquire into alleged “corrupt violations of duty” by another co-ordinate branch of the Government, (the Executive,) is the power of impeachment.

By the terms of the resolution referred to the committee, and by the express declaration of the mover of that resolution, as well as by the legal construction of the constitutional powers of the House, this inquiry cannot be brought within the only other clause of the constitution which, by any possible implication, can be made applicable to it, viz: that “the Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.”

The allegation is nowhere made that the laws are defective in relation to the “powers vested in any department or officer” of the Government, and that this inquiry is made to enable Congress to “make laws;” but the charges are against the individual officers for “corrupt violation” of existing laws; and the ground is expressly taken by the chairman, in his declaration, under oath, (page 15 of journal,) “that the whole Government needs reform, and more patriotic and honest men to administer it.”

The committee, therefore, conceive that they were fully warranted and imperatively required to regard this investigation in the light of a preliminary inquiry into facts and evidence, to show whether a process of impeachment ought not to be instituted by the House of Representatives against the Executive and the heads of departments.

Any other construction of the resolution, it seems to the committee, would be unjust to themselves and derogatory to the dignity of the House, as a legislative body, by assuming that they had required nine of its members, acting on this committee, to detach themselves from the proper business of legislation, with power to send for persons and papers, at great inconvenience to citizens summoned before them, and at a great waste of the public time and money, with no legal object whatever in view within the constitutional powers of the House.

This view of the duties of the committee, and the nature of the inquiry instituted through them, will explain the grounds of their general course, as detailed in their journal, in relation to the class of questions to witnesses, and the calls upon public officers, which they felt bound to admit or reject in the progress of the investigation.

If, then, the committee are well founded in their view of the constitutional power of the House to create a committee in matters not appertaining to the law-making power of Congress, to inquire into alleged corrupt violations of duty by a co-ordinate and independent branch of the Government, it follows that they were bound to give a strict construction to the resolution empowering them to act, and to regard it not as a piece of party machinery to run down this administration or embarrass and discredit the next, but as a direct instruction to inquire whether proofs of corrupt violations of duty, amounting to matter of impeachment, could be produced against the heads of the executive departments.

The bearing of the resolution, from its reference to a particular passage in the annual message of the President, might seem to have been to get up an issue of fact between the House of Representatives and the Executive, as to the truth of a paragraph in that message. Such an inquiry might, with propriety, within the meaning and spirit of the constitution, be had, in relation to such portions of a message from the President as recommended or contemplated the legislative action of Congress thereon. But can it be entertained as a position consistent with the respect and decorum due from one branch of the Government to another, that in matters of alleged fact in a message of the Executive, having no reference to any act of legislation, or in the mere expression of an intention or belief, a formal investigation, through the intervention of sworn witnesses, with full powers to send for persons and papers, may be instituted by one branch of the Government, to test the veracity or sincerity of another branch of the Government?

Such would be the extraordinary character of this investigation, if the question of veracity and sincerity were to be put at issue between the House of Representatives and the President, upon a passage in the annual message—a passage merely complimentary, on the retirement of the President from office, to the heads of the departments; and declaratory of the intention of the President, during his administration, to have the departments conducted with ability and integrity, and of his belief that they have been so conducted. Here, then, are a compliment, an intention, and belief, having no reference whatever to the legislation of Congress, which (under any other construction than that which the committee have given to the resolution) would have been made the subject of grave investigation by witnesses under oath, and by calls upon the executive departments, in order to decide and report to the House whether, in the opinion of the committee, the President had improperly flattered his cabinet officers, or had insincerely and falsely stated his own intention and belief in regard to them!

The committee do believe that, to have gone into such an investigation upon such a construction of the resolution referred to them, and of the constitutional powers of the House, would have been to trifle with the House, with a co-ordinate branch of the Government, and with the country.

That there may be no doubt that the passage in the President's message, which is recited as the basis of the resolution proposing investigation, will bear no other construction than the one here put upon it, as a mere expression of belief and intention, and not a recommendation of a public measure to Congress, let that passage be examined in this connexion, viz:

“Before concluding this paper, I think it due to the various executive departments to bear testimony to their prosperous condition, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce, in all of them, a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business; and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation."

This investigation, as the committee think they have clearly shown, could be instituted only for one of two purposes—impeachment or legislation; they have shown it was not for legislation, because no defect in the laws has been anywhere alleged, only in their execution. The very charge, "corrupt violation of duty," implies that the laws are well enough, but are corruptly administered. It was not the laws, therefore, that the resolution proposed to reform, but the administration of those laws; consequently, so long as neither "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," were proved, or even indicated in any alleged act of "corrupt violation of duty," notwithstanding the earnest call of the President and heads of departments upon the committee "to point to any case where there is the slightest reason to suspect corruption or abuse of trust;" by what authority, or for what purpose, within the constitutional powers of the House, could this committee go into an inquiry in the nature of an impeachment, upon any other than specific allegations, to be proved by extraneous evidence, and not by calling for confessions from the parties accused; and which allegations, if proved, would amount to matter of impeachment?

Is it not apparent, therefore, that the only constitutional and legal object of instituting an inquiry into the conduct of the heads of the executive departments, and the complaints of neglect or violation of their "duties pertaining to the public interest," must be to ascertain whether, instead of deserving the compliment in the President's message, they have not violated the laws so as to deserve impeachment?

What, then, was the duty of the committee under the resolution? Surely not to make an issue with the President on a matter of compliment, intention, and belief; surely not to embody, in the form of evidence, the assertions of every vindictive, disaffected, or disappointed man, who should hint suspicion, with or without the concealment of his name, or with a pledge of secrecy from those of the committee to whom he might communicate his vague aspersions; surely not to give the impress of solemn inquiry, under oath, to the anonymous rancor and malevolence of the party press in its assaults upon the characters of men in or out of office; but, in the language of their instructions, "to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments," and "into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them;" a "condition" and "manner" solely relating to this discharge of "duties pertaining to the public interest," and growing out of the direct personal acts of the heads of the departments and their agents: not in their private relations; not in their individual transactions; not in any matter whatever that does not appertain, by law, to the discharge of their public duties; but such a "condition" of the departments, and such a "manner of discharging the public business in them," as, if proved, would amount to "corrupt violation of duty," and justify a process of impeachment against the authors of, and the connivers at, such corruption.

And, further, by the instructions to the committee, this "corrupt violation of duty," this "condition" of the departments, and the "manner" of conducting the public business in them, are to be proved by an examination "into all causes of complaint, from any quarter." Complaint of what? Of private acts of officers or agents of the Government, not pertaining to the public interest, and not declared unlawful? Surely not; but, in the language of the resolution, complaint at the manner in which said departments, or their officers or agents, "in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured and impaired the public service and interest;" clearly meaning such corrupt neglect and violation of duty as would come within the "misdemeanors" for which the constitution provides the process of impeachment.

One of the powers conferred on the committee by the resolution of the House was, the power to send for persons and papers; another proof that the investigation was to be regarded in the nature of an inquiry preliminary to impeachment. At best, this is a vague and not well-defined power; incidental, and not derived from any express provision in the constitution. In its exercise, therefore, there should be some limitation; and it should be carefully used; only in cases where the direct legislation of Congress, the protection and enforcement of the privileges and rules of either House, or manifest public interest, imperatively demand it. It is a judicial power, which Congress can exercise merely as a power incidental to the power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper."

To construe it into an unlimited power for a committee of this House to bring before them the persons of citizens from any part of the Union, at their own arbitrary will, without just cause, or to compel the surrender of all papers which a committee might see fit to send for, would be to set up an incidental power of the House, nowhere expressly recognised in the constitution, which would totally annul one of the express provisions of the constitution, to secure the citizen against these very outrages, viz:

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures."

In applying this principle to the calls which were proposed, in this investigation, upon the President and heads of departments, for statements and papers, the committee have considered that a public officer is not put without the pale of the protection afforded to other citizens, against being required to furnish statements or evidence to accuse himself; and against unreasonable demands for papers not constituting a part of the public documents; and, in their opinion, the call for papers ought to be limited to such as are already made and on file in the departments.

To every call for statements going to show any act of a public officer without authority of law, and for papers coming within the above description, the committee have uniformly responded in the affirmative; while, as a general rule, they have felt bound to reject all calls for statements touching motives and acts not shown to be unlawful, if proved; and for all real or supposed papers, private in their character, and not coming within the denomination of public papers on file.

If it be contended that this distinction enables a public officer to exclude from the files of his department whatever he chooses to consider private, and which ought to be placed there, the answer is, that this cannot alter the powers of a committee of the House to send for papers, nor change the nature of the call; and if any paper, shown to be of a public character, and such as ought to be placed on file or record, is excluded, there is just ground for accusation against the officer for violation of duty. But the bare suspicion that papers which ought to be on file are not there cannot warrant a call for all the personal and private papers of such officer, in order that the committee may decide, by inspection, whether there are any which ought to go into the public files.

Besides, in calls made by Congress upon the President or heads of departments, the reservation is impliedly established, by usage, of such papers as, in their opinion, cannot be communicated without injury to the public service. Consequently, all calls for papers must be subject to this discretion of the public officer of whom they are required; and if he abuses that discretion he must be held responsible for it in some other form of investigation into his official conduct.

The committee can find no power in their instructions to inquire into motives: illegal acts, or omission of legal acts, are the subjects of their investigation. With this view, too plain to require illustration, the committee refused to go into any investigation touching the motives with which the President and the heads of departments, or other officers under them, had exercised the appointing and removing power, or their lawful official patronage; and in this course they are sustained by the uniform refusal of Congress to inquire into such motives.

Whenever there was pointed out "any case where there was the slightest reason to suspect" that the appointing or removing power, or the employment of any individual, had been exercised "without authority of law," or where, within legal authority, a fraudulent officer had been retained in office, and his malversations connived at, in all such matters of allegation or suspicion the committee have given the broadest latitude to inquiry.

But in cases where an act had been done by due authority of law, in the exercise of the power of nomination conferred on the President by the constitution, or of the power of appointment of inferior officers vested by law, under the constitution, "in the President alone, in the courts of law, in the heads of departments," or in other officers, the committee considered that they had no authority to inquire into mere motives, or matters of opinion, touching either the power appointing or the persons appointed; the act itself being a lawful exercise of discretionary power.

Whatever might be the result of such an inquiry into motives, had it been gone into, it would not have been within the province of the committee to recommend, nor of the legislation of Congress to enact a law, requiring that the President and other officers having the power of nomination or of appointment should select their political opponents and neglect their friends, or prescribing what sort of qualifications and what sort of political opinions the persons they appoint to office should possess. As well might a committee of the House, instructed to inquire into the "condition" and the "manner" of conducting the business in the judiciary department, on accusations in the nature of an impeachment of the judges, undertake to call in question the motives of the Supreme or any other inferior court of law, in appointing its officers and clerks. As well might a committee of one House inquire into the motives of the other House in selecting its presiding and other officers, as for this committee to investigate the motives of the President, the heads of departments, or inferior officers, in the lawful exercise of the appointing and removing power. The people must judge for themselves of the motives, intentions, and opinions, of their public servants, in the exercise of their official functions; and with the people, in all cases where they elect, and with those who appoint or remove, in all cases of subordinate or inferior officers not elected by the people, rests the right of condemning or approving any act of a public officer in the exercise of his constitutional and lawful power of appointment and removal.

If the will and the wishes of the people are to be regarded as the only legitimate censors of the motives and opinions of an administration, in generally preferring competent political friends to political foes in appointments to office, it is obvious that the course of the administration for the last eight years, in this respect, as far as it has gone, has been most signally and triumphantly sustained. In fact, is not the assumption set up by the opponents of the administration, that it ought to place the official power in the hands of the opposers of the principles and measures which that administration was chosen by the people to maintain and enforce, nothing less than the declaration that the majority ought to let the minority govern?

The committee will now proceed to an examination of the calls on the executive departments, and the testimony offered and given in this investigation, applying to both the analysis they have endeavored to present of the grounds of their proceedings.

The committee, in commencing their labors, had no accusations to make, either of their own knowledge or derived from any private disclosures to them, of corrupt violations of law, or neglect or abuse of official duty. But they were instructed to "inquire," and they were ready to receive any information, authorize any call, or admit any testimony coming within the construction which they put upon the resolution defining their duty and jurisdiction.

They inferred that the chairman of the committee, who had moved the resolution that induced the House, almost unanimously, to institute inquiry, would be ready to formally present and distinctly point out such specifications and evidence as would come within the constitutional and legal rights of the parties implicated, and the powers of the committee.

The form chosen by him, in the inquiry, was a series of resolutions, offered by the chairman, (page 4 of journal,) calling upon the President and heads of departments for certain information.

The first resolution, in that call, required of all the departments a minute exhibit of every item in the accounts of every printer or editor of a newspaper, who had been paid a dollar within the last year; with the residence, name, service, consideration, &c.

This was a call devolving immense and, in fact, wholly impracticable labor upon the departments. It had no connexion with the "condition of the various executive departments." It had nothing to do with complaints at the "manner" in which the public officers had fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of the creation of the executive departments; nor did it involve any violation of duty, or any act injuring and impairing the public service and interest. It was a call for information of legal acts; the mover of the call admitting that "the illegal patronage of the Government to the press would not subsidize a two-penny country newspaper."

At the same time the charge made was, abuse of the patronage of the departments to subsidize the public press, and a "corrupt violation of duty, in abusing legal authority, in corrupting and subsidizing the public press."

Now, if the law required the heads of departments to employ newspapers for certain specific acts, at stipulated or reasonable prices, (and it is not alleged that they have employed any more newspapers or paid any more compensation than the law allows,) where is the violation of duty? Where is the subsidizing and corrupting the public press?

If the officers of the Government, in compliance with acts of Congress enjoining this duty, employ an editor or printer of a newspaper to publish an advertisement, and pay him a fair compensation, as others do in like cases, in matters of private business, is it a fair or just imputation upon the whole community of editors and printers throughout the United States, to represent them as being a class of citizens so mercenary and unprincipled as to be susceptible of being subsidized and bought up to sustain men and measures they in reality condemn—bought, too, not by any gratuity or bounty, but by the mere payment of a fair price for the same services which they are constantly receiving pay for from private individuals? Is the doctrine to be maintained, that the people of this country are so degraded and corrupt, that every citizen who sells an article in his trade or business to the Government, or performs a service for it, and is paid, becomes thereby subsidized and profligate, and sells his conscience along with his commodities and labor?

Can the head of a department, by a Government advertisement, corrupt or subsidize the press, any more than a bank, a corporation, or a merchant could, by giving their advertisements to a newspaper; especially where the employment from the latter sources is so much more profitable, so much larger in amount, and so much more widely distributed, and generally upon grounds of strict party preference?

The committee do not believe that the employment of a newspaper to publish what the law requires to be published, for a fair equivalent, is to be regarded in the light of favor or patronage, any more than the employment of any other mechanical labor by the Government or by private citizens.

Besides, would it not be well for those who make this charge of mercenary corruption against editors and printers of newspapers, to reflect that it is their own party press they censure; for the plain reason, that the administration need not buy up the newspapers that already support its measures; and that, if there is any buying or corrupting, the traffic must be carried on with those editors and printers who oppose the administration?

If, then, the allegation is merely that the officers of the Government, who are required by law to employ newspapers, exercise their own discretion, strictly within the law, in employing such as they think proper, does it not resolve the whole question into an inquiry into motives, (not an inquiry into violation of law,) an inquiry which the committee have shown is not within their jurisdiction under the resolution referred to them?

And if this call upon the departments had been adopted, and could have been carried into effect, of what avail would have been a detail of all the items of newspaper advertising, embracing every letter remaining in post offices, every proposal for mail contracts, for work, for supplies, and the like, within the provisions of law, to detect abuses, or to discover whether the press of the country was "subsidized" and "corrupted" by being paid for its mechanical labor? Had such returns been made in an answer to the proposed call, this committee, instead of inquiring into the condition of the executive departments, must have resolved itself into mere auditors of newspaper accounts.

Again: If the administration, in the use of its legal employment of the newspaper press, corrupts and subsidizes that press, and if the press of the country is susceptible of such corruption, how happens it that the opponents of the administration, though in a minority, sustain so many more newspapers than are sustained by the party in power? Of the daily press, for instance, in the city of New York, there are nine opposition to two administration papers; in Philadelphia, six to two; in Baltimore, four to one; in Boston, seven to two; in New Orleans, six to two; in Albany, two to one; and even in the city of Washington, two to one—making, in seven of the principal cities, thirty-six opposition to eleven daily administration papers. A like comparison extended throughout the Union would show nearly the same result.

The committee have dwelt longer on this topic than its real importance might seem to demand. They have done so, because it appeared to be one of the most vehemently urged grounds of accusation against the executive officers, and was brought before the committee for a decision seven distinct times by the mover of the call, in the form of resolves, amendments, and questions to witnesses, and was each time rejected by the committee, for the reasons here stated.

Their object was to get at practical results, and not, by a mass of papers, encumber all inquiry or examination into the condition of the executive departments, and the discharge of the public duties by their officers and agents. In this, as in all other cases, the rule the committee uniformly adhered to was, that they were ready to inquire into any act of abuse or violation of law, or neglect of duty, complained of from any quarter, and presented in any specific form of allegation susceptible of investigation by any known principles of evidence. They believed it to be neither practicable, nor within their powers, to call upon the executive departments for a history of every act of those departments during the last eight years, and then go into an examination of this history, to detect, if possible, some act that might be construed into a violation of law. As well might a citizen be arraigned by a public prosecutor, and called upon to relate every transaction of his life, in order to discover whether there was not some act for which an indictment would lie against him.

On the grounds heretofore explained, the committee rejected questions to witnesses as to any supposed possible connexion of officers of the Government with the newspaper press, except in cases where it appeared that such connexion, if proved, was a violation of law, or of some rule or requisition of the department with which such officers were connected.

A question proposed to the Postmaster General, (page 121 of journal,) as to political combinations of officers of the executive departments to influence the public press, was permitted to be put, on the ground that the combination charged might be in the nature of a conspiracy, and, therefore, a violation of law. The answer of Mr. Kendall entirely negated the existence of any such combination within his knowledge. Another question to the same witness, as to the supposed existence of a club or association, and whether its members were officers and agents of the executive departments, and what its designs and means were, and a similar question to Mr. Secretary Woodbury, (page 81 of journal,) were rejected, because the questions involved no violation of law, and had no relation to the manner of discharging the public duties in those Departments. The committee could not prescribe what political or literary or social associations the public officers should or should not belong to, any more than they could the religious denomination to which they should or should not be attached. A question, also, put to the Secretary of the Treasury, (page 80 of journal, question 13,) was rejected, because it went into the motives of the executive departments in employing editors and printers, in the exercise of a discretion authorized by law.

This review embraces all the material matters in the course of the investigation, relating to the newspaper press; and the committee, in disposing of this branch of the grounds of complaint against the executive departments, feel bound to say that no evidence whatever was produced, or offered to be produced, by any specific allegation, of the acts of any officer or agent of the various executive departments, which goes, in the least degree, to sustain the grave charge of a violation of public duty in subsidizing and corrupting the public press.

The second resolution offered by the chairman (page 4 of the journal) proposed a call on the President and heads of departments for a list of all officers, &c. appointed and paid without having been nominated to or confirmed by the Senate.

If this meant inferior officers, the appointment of whom is vested in the President and heads of departments by Congress, it was a useless call, and implied no violation of duty.

If it meant the appointment, and not merely the nomination, of officers required by law to be confirmed by the Senate, it could only apply to the President; and no such supposed case was suggested as the ground of the call.

The third resolution proposed calling for the amounts of moneys paid for contingencies by the departments, (page 5 of the journal,) for changes in specific appropriations, and for irregular expenditures.

The fourth resolution called for a list of officers and agents who had received salaries or pay without rendering service or being in office, whose commissions had been antedated, and who were engaged in other employment or held other offices, whilst receiving pay and rendering no service.

The inquiry proposed by the third and fourth resolutions above described, in fact, comes within the provisions of the 77th and 78th rules of the House of Representatives, to which the President, in his reply to the call on him, very properly referred the committee, and the extent of which did not occur to them when the resolutions were under consideration. Those rules establish a standing committee for each of the departments, whose duty it is "to examine the state of accounts and expenditures," and to inquire and report particularly whether the expenditures of the respective departments are justified by law; whether the claims discharged are supported by sufficient vouchers, establishing their justness as to their character and amount, and have been discharged out of funds appropriated therefor; whether all moneys have been disbursed in conformity with appropriation laws; whether any retrenchment can be made in the expenditures of the several departments; and to report such provisions as may be necessary to add to the economy of the several departments, and the accountability of their officers.

These powers and duties embrace every matter of inquiry proposed in the call upon the heads of the executive departments, by the third and fourth resolutions. It therefore was not the province of a select committee to interfere with the prescribed duties of a standing committee.

The committee were satisfied of the impropriety and inconsistency of all the calls upon the President and heads of departments embraced in the resolutions offered by the chairman; but to reject them entirely in the beginning, although, in effect, they called upon the accused to furnish evidence against themselves, might have subjected the committee to the charge of suppressing inquiry, from apprehension of disclosures injurious to the departments. They preferred, therefore, to assume the responsibility of giving too great latitude to inquiry, rather than to seem to check it in the beginning; but they were bound by the construction of their powers to limit the inquiry to violations of public duty. With this view, the resolutions were amended, by being confined to acts "without authority of law;" there being, otherwise, no definite limits, scope, or perceptible object, in the proposed calls. With this limitation, they permitted the calls to be made; and the replies to them by the President and heads of departments entirely negative any presumption, arising from this source, of neglect or violation of official duty.

The committee, therefore, could see no ground for adopting the resolution, proposed on receipt of the President's letter, to dissolve the committee, on the ground that that letter and the President's instructions to the heads of the departments would bar all investigation. (See page 19 of journal.) Instead of barring, the letter of the President invited investigation.

It says: "If you are able to point to any case, where there is the slightest reason to suspect corruption or abuse of trust, no obstacle which I can remove shall be interposed to prevent the fullest scrutiny by all legal means. The offices of all the departments will be open to you, and every proper facility furnished for this purpose."

The replies from all the heads of departments have been to the same effect, pledging the whole disposable force of their offices to ferret out any the slightest specified act of neglect or violation of public duty complained of from any quarter; and not only so, but affirming that they knew of no employment or payment of printers, officers, or agents, in their departments, without authority of law.

Neither did the committee discover in the letter of the President any attack upon the proceedings of the House or the privileges of its members; for the plain reason that neither the House nor its members have any privilege to call upon parties accused to criminate themselves. Consequently, they could not sanction the resolution offered by the chairman, (page 29 of journal,) to censure the President for his emphatic repulsion of what he construed to mean charges of personal accusation, and calls for self-crimination; nor could they consent to put a stop to the public business by getting up a debate in the House to enforce any pretended "privilege" of the House or its committees, to compel public officers to furnish evidence against themselves.

The committee would suggest one other reason for permitting these calls to be made on the parties implicated thereby, for acts done without authority of law. This might be construed to mean palpable violations of law, or it might mean a mere prescriptive irregularity in the business of a department, not provided for by law, but supposed to be incidental to some general provision, or sanctioned by long usage.

With this view, the committee appended to the calls the 5th resolution, requesting explanations as to any innovations not authorized by law, if such existed; and they also considered that there was a distinction, as to the strict rules of evidence, between a letter of inquiry and a question put to a witness under oath. In cases where witnesses were called before them, the committee felt bound to adhere to the rule by which self-accusing questions were excluded; and this will explain the reason of the rejection of a large class of the very numerous questions put by the chairman.

That too much latitude has sometimes been given in admitting self-accusing questions to be put to witnesses, is quite probable. The committee notice one, and there may be others in the journal, viz: the question put to Mr. Secretary Woodbury, (page 80,) as to his being engaged in purchases of public lands, which, in his case, would be a violation of law. The witness, however, waived his obvious right not to reply, and fully answered in the negative. If there has been error or inconsistency, therefore, in not conducting the examination of witnesses invariably on the known rules of evidence, it has been on the side, not of exclusion, but of admission of questions. It has also shown that the several members of the committee decided on each matter as it came up, without previous concert—the adoption or rejection of a question frequently being determined by a single vote, or by the equal division of the committee.

During the thirty days of the actual sittings of the committee, the following-named witnesses were examined, viz:

Hon. Henry A. Wise, Hon. Abijah Mann, jr., Hon. James Parker, Hon. John Bell, Hon. Hugh L. White, Hon. Balie Peyton, Hon. F. W. Pickens, Hon. Dutee J. Pearce, Hon. A. H. Sevier, and Hon. Garret D. Wall, all members of Congress; S. R. Hobbie, of the Post Office Department; William Van Hook, of New York; William D. Lewis, Philadelphia; Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury; John Forsyth, Secretary of State; Amos Kendall, Postmaster General; William Littlefield, Newport, Rhode Island; James L. Anthony, Treasury Department; James L. Edwards and George W. Crump, Pension Office; D. A. A. Buck, War Department; George W. B. Towns, Georgia; Charles Morris and Charles W. Goldsborough, Navy Commissioners' Office; N. Towson, Paymaster General; Samuel D. Langtree, War Department; David Henshaw, Massachusetts; and John Ross, a Cherokee chief—28.

Hon. Aaron Vanderpoel, Hon. James Standefer, members of Congress, and William J. Duane, late Secretary of the Treasury, attended as witnesses; but the questions propounded to them were rejected, on grounds fully explained in this report, and obvious from the nature of the inquiries proposed. (See pages of journal 60, 77, and 81.)

Hon. John C. Calhoun, of the Senate, was summoned as a witness, but neither attended nor replied to the call.

Hon. Felix Grundy, of the Senate, was requested to attend as a witness, on motion of the chairman; and though not acceding to the right of the committee to require his attendance, he communicated his readiness, when not engaged in public business, voluntarily to wait upon the committee and give testimony, if notified. No such notice was given to Mr. Grundy.

Honorables Cave Johnson and James J. McKay, of the House of Representatives, were also summoned, at the request of the chairman, but not examined.

The witnesses who were summoned and appeared, but were not examined, were Jonathan Seaver, (office of Second Comptroller;) John N. Moulder, Thomas B. Reilly, Robert S. Wharton, David Saunders, and John J. Abert, of Washington; Samuel Kendall and Charles Gooch, (Post Office Department;) Henry L. Ellsworth, (Patent Office;) John M. Walker, Richard Harrison, (First Auditor's Office;) John Green, (War Department.)

The witnesses summoned, and who did not appear, were J. L. Joseph, New York; R. J. Phillips, James Schott, Henry Fry, and James Reeside, Philadelphia; N. S. Ruggles, Newport, R. I.; Duncan Clinch and Reuben M. Whitney, Washington; David Williamson and John S. Shriver, of Baltimore. Interrogatories sent to James Jackson, of Alabama, were not returned. Thirty witnesses summoned and not examined.

One hundred and fifty-two questions were proposed to witnesses under examination. Of these, one hundred and thirty-one were proposed by the chairman, (Mr. Wise,) except five or six put by the member from Massachusetts, (Mr. Lincoln.) The remaining twenty-one were all that were suggested by other members of the committee. Eighty-nine of the questions were adopted, and sixty-three rejected.

The proposition is therefore presented from these facts as a conclusive answer to all pretence, if set up, that no abuses have been detected, because the committee suppressed investigation, viz: that if eighty-nine questions were put to some thirty witnesses, without, in the opinion of the committee, drawing out a single material fact calling in question the ability, integrity, and fidelity, with which the executive departments have been conducted, does it not follow, either that the interrogatories were unskillfully framed, or that the fifty-eight rejected questions were the only ones that specified any act of abuse, neglect, or violation of duty? An examination of the questions rejected and admitted will demonstrate that no such distinction exists between them.

To enable them to get at all the means of detecting abuses, the committee called upon the chairman, who was the mover of the resolution in the House, to state, under oath, whether he, of his own knowledge, knew of any act of the heads of the executive departments that was either corrupt or a violation of duty. Failing in this, and receiving no answer, except a declaration of the political creed of the witness, he was then called upon for the names of those from whom he had received the information on which he founded his belief that the executive departments have corruptly violated their duties. His answer was, (page 16, journal:)

"I do positively refuse to give up the names of those who have informed me as to the conduct or misconduct of executive officers."

How, then, could the investigation be prosecuted further than it has been, if the mover of the resolution, who affirms he has information from certain persons, on which he founds a belief of the existence of corrupt violations of law, and of which the rest of the committee are entirely ignorant, positively refuses to give up the names of his informers, that they may be called upon to disclose these alleged acts of corruption and violation of duty?

Under such circumstances, can there be just cause for complaint of the committee, of the Executive, or of the heads of departments, that they have restricted or withheld proofs of violation of duty, when he himself, by his own admission, as a member of the committee, is in possession of the names of witnesses who can prove the charges, and yet refuses to name or to call those witnesses? Who is responsible for restricting inquiry, if he is not, who, having the names of witnesses within his knowledge, refuses to give up their names, or call upon them to testify? If the reason assigned for withholding the names of the alleged witnesses, viz: that they are "dependent upon the will of arbitrary power for the stations they hold," is a justification of this refusal, does it not amount to a useless waste of the time of the House, and the labor of the committee, to demand an investigation in order to prove corrupt violations of public duty by the executive officers, when it was known that neither to the House nor to the committee could or would be disclosed the names of the witnesses who, it was assumed, could prove this corrupt violation of official duty?

The committee do not impugn the motives or call in question the course of proceeding adopted by any member of the committee, but they are bound to state all the alleged sources of information which have been withheld in the investigation.

Here the committee might justly have declined all further proceeding; but they deemed it more satisfactory to use all the means in their power of arriving at the foundation of the charges that had been made of misconduct and corruption in the heads of the executive departments. With this view they called upon those who, they had reason to believe, were best acquainted with the facts and the witnesses in the case, and requested the attendance before them of Messrs. Bell, Peyton, and Pickens, of the House, and Messrs. White and Calhoun, of the Senate. The first three of those gentlemen complained of this proceeding as an act of personal injustice, and an infringement of the freedom of debate; but on no grounds which the committee can consider just or reasonable. They were called upon as the best sources to furnish the committee with proofs or with the names of witnesses; and, instead of doing so, they make complaints against the committee and the President, as if they were the authors of the charges, the movers of the resolution of inquiry, and the promoters of this whole investigation! They testify to no corrupt act that they know, but to much that they "have been informed of and verily believe," but give no names of informers or witnesses, who know the alleged acts of corruption in official duty.

The voluminous statements and arguments of these gentlemen, including that of Judge White, occupy seventy-one pages of the printed journal, setting forth their political creeds and belief, in the form of testimony under oath. They communicate no facts, nor allegations of facts, that have not been fully discussed, in almost every particular, in the public press; been tested by the votes of the people in the elections, or passed upon in some form or other by one or both Houses of Congress. The committee permitted them to form a part of their journal, though they are argumentative, and entirely devoid of every legal characteristic of testimony; but, as they prove nothing, the committee do not regard them as having any bearing whatever upon the inquiry they were instructed to make into the condition of the executive departments, and the allegations of corrupt violation of duty. The statements of those gentlemen, and particularly that of Judge White, who was released from every obligation of private confidence by the President, are remarkable proofs of the purity and honesty with which the administration has been conducted. These gentlemen were for years the political friends of the President, and in his confidence. They are now his opponents, and have been called on to state every transaction they knew, implying a violation of public duty; and they have not disclosed a single fact within their own knowledge that affects the character or conduct of the President or heads of departments in the discharge of their public duties. Even the statements they adopt from others, whether true or false, relate to private opinions and acts having no connexion with the discharge or neglect of public duty. One of their opinions is, that there was favoritism and extravagance in the appointment of, and allowance to, the three commissioners on Indian treaties, under the act of July 14, 1832. "The commission," says Mr. Bell, (page 263 of the journal,) "turned out to be almost an entire failure." This opinion, unsupported by any evidence, is singularly at variance with the report made by a member of the opposition, from the Committee on Indian Affairs in the House of Representatives, May 20, 1834. That committee, in reference to this same commission, say, (page 23 of their report:) "The labors of the committee have been much assisted by the very able and interesting report of the commissioners, which is annexed to this report. It contains much valuable information, and will enable the public to appreciate the zeal, industry, and ability, with which they have executed the duties of their commission."

The opinion of Mr. Bell in this matter would also seem to be at variance with the fact that the Senate have approved and ratified important treaties made by these same commissioners with the Cherokee, Creek, Seneca, Seneca and Shawnee, Quapaw, Otto, Missouri, and Pawnee tribes of Indians.

The compensation allowed the commissioners appears to have been in strict conformity with the usages of the Government under previous administrations, viz: the per diem and mileage of members of Congress.

That there have been abuses and gross injustice towards the Indians practised by speculators and unprincipled men, is undoubtedly true; but none of these abuses are traced to any act, authority, neglect, or connivance of the President and heads of departments; and in every instance, where fraud or injustice is shown to have been alleged against any public agent, the executive officers have been prompt in investigating and correcting the evil. This fact fully appears from the "documents relating to the letter of R. T. Archer to the chairman," (pages 125 and 274 of journal.) In that matter, (which is made a ground of complaint after a lapse of more than three years, coming from the distance of Columbus, Mississippi,) it appears that the complainant is totally mistaken in his facts—the President and the department having caused a full investigation of the charges, and "the strictest inquiry into this matter," and the Commissioner of the Land Office having ordered the decision of the register at Chocchuma to be corrected, so far as it was erroneous.

The impropriety of witnesses substituting party opinions for testimony, under oath, is shown in the statement of Hon. F. W. Pickens, (page 46 of journal.) He appeared as a witness, to testify whether he knew, of his own knowledge, of any act, by either of the heads of the executive departments, which was corrupt, or a violation of their official duties. His answer is, that he knows of many acts in violation of official duty, but will name only those that are most prominent; and then he places at the head of violations of official duty the proclamation of the President in 1832, against the nullification doctrines of South Carolina! The removal of the deposits, the employment of State banks, proscription, and the specie Treasury order, make up the catalogue of "gross and palpable violations of official duty," affirmed by the witness. Had the testimony of numerous honorable Senators and Representatives of the opposition party, to which the witness belongs, comprising a majority, been taken in this matter, they would doubtless have pronounced the proclamation against nullification the purest act of the whole administration; and had a vast majority of the people testified before the committee as they have done through the ballot-box, they would have pronounced all the other acts of the administration, referred to by Mr. Pickens, the highest and most faithful discharge of official duties.

What, then, are the facts touching the "condition" of the executive departments, the "manner" in which the public business has been discharged in them, and "the causes of complaints against them," which are proved in this investigation?

The charges attempted to be proved are:

First. Speculations in the public lands. The committee permitted this inquiry to be made, touching all officers who were by law prohibited from purchasing or speculating in the public lands. The acts of September 2, 1789, and March 3, 1791, prohibit such purchase to persons appointed to any office instituted by the act to establish the Treasury Department, and to all the clerks employed therein. There was no proof before the committee that any officer or clerk, prohibited by law from dealing in the public lands, had violated the law.

The committee did not feel authorized to extend this inquiry to public officers who were not prohibited from making such purchases, such act not being a violation of official duty any more than the purchase of any article of trade or commerce. If it leads to abuses, Congress should apply the remedy.

Second. Disbursing officers drawing specie, and selling the same as merchandise to purchasers of public lands or others. The evidence (pages 30, 32, 37) negatives this charge.

Third. "Paying a Treasury warrant which was gambled away by a disbursing officer." This charge was first suggested as an allegation that drafts to the amount of $20,000 had been paid by the late Secretary of War, Governor Cass, to the assignee of a disbursing officer named Johnston, with the knowledge that they had been gambled away, and after they had been protested by a deposit bank, and countermanded by the Secretary of the Treasury. The facts in this case are highly creditable to the vigilance of the executive departments. Instead of $20,000, the amount was $2,500, which was not paid to the holder until it was proved that the drafts came into his possession with no knowledge of the original gambling transfer; nor then, until the opinion of the Attorney General had been taken, and ample indemnity secured to the Government, should it be made to appear that the holder was cognizant of the fraudulent transfer. This case is fully explained in the testimony of Hon. Ambrose H. Sevier, (page 49 of journal,) by documents, (pages 62 to 71,) and the opinion of the Attorney General, (page 68 of journal.) It does not appear that Johnston, the disbursing officer, who died soon after this transaction, was employed after the fraud by the Department.

Fourth. The case of T. B. Waterman, viz: the allowance of an exorbitant account by Mr. Secretary Cass, after it had been virtually disallowed; and then paying it after its allowance had been forged, without causing the offender to be prosecuted. The facts in evidence are, that Waterman was temporarily employed to copy papers in the Pension Office, for which he presented a bill of $188. It was not allowed. Subsequently, an assignee of the bill, Mr. Causten, of Washington, who had advanced the amount to Waterman, presented it, endorsed with the approval of Mr. Secretary Cass, which proved to be a forgery, and it was not paid. Some months after, the claim was again presented by the assignee, and, being reduced to $144, which was a fair compensation for the work, it was allowed and paid. (See pages 51 and 57 of journal.) This transaction was entirely proper on the part of the Department. The forgery on the first account did not discharge the actual debt due; nor was the Secretary of War, or his agents, bound to prosecute Waterman; and neither were they in possession of proof that he committed the forgery, except from the statement of Mr. Causten to Mr. Crump, that he had confessed it to the former.

Fifth. The case of David Melvill, a weigher and gauger in the customs at Newport. The charge is, that Melvill was removed from office for opinion's sake. The facts are, that when Mr. Ellery, the collector who appointed Melvill, resigned, and Mr. Littlefield was appointed collector, the latter, in the exercise of the discretion the law gave him in such cases, did not reappoint Melvill, whose office was at an end by the resignation of his principal. The public service was not impaired, but, it would seem, promoted by this act; and, as it comes under the class of inquiries into motives, it was not, for reasons before given, within the jurisdiction of this committee. In fact, at the very time it was pressed upon this committee, a standing committee of the House (on Commerce) had the whole matter in charge, on a petition from David Melvill, and made their report, February 23d, adverse to the petitioner. The same subject was before the Senate the last session, and all the documents connected with it published at that time. A full explanation of the case is given in the testimony of Mr. Littlefield and Mr. Secretary Woodbury, (pages 189, 75, and 80, of journal.)

Sixth. The case of J. W. Reckless, collector at Perth Amboy, New Jersey. This appears to be a charge under the head of "retaining corrupt and fraudulent officers in place, knowing of their malfeasance in office." The specification is wholly unsupported by the evidence in the case, which has encumbered the journal with a mass of documents occupying fifty-eight printed pages. The President, in the exercise of his discretion, and with all the original papers before him, decided that irregular incidental expenses had been charged, but that there was no proof of corruption or fraud, and the collector was required to refund the irregular charges. This case is fully and satisfactorily explained in the answers of Hon. Garret D. Wall, of the Senate, to questions put to him, (page 309 of journal.) This is the only specific allegation made of corrupt retaining in office; and the facts disclosed warrant no suspicion of improper acts or motives in the executive officer.

Seventh. The late Secretary of War, Governor Cass, paying for services never performed. The evidence on this point (pages 51 and 54) is, that D. A. A. Buck, a citizen of Vermont, received the appointment of a clerk in the Pension Office July 8, 1835; that, on the 27th of that month, he commenced his journey to Washington, which journey was suspended and interrupted in consequence of severe indisposition; that, during the delay of his journey, thus caused, he was elected a member of the Vermont Legislature the first Tuesday of September following, and took his seat the second Thursday in October, and continued a member of the Legislature five weeks, till its adjournment; that on the 20th November he proceeded to Washington, and entered upon the duties of his office December 4th; that he presented his account to Mr. Secretary Cass, who knew the facts in the case, for salary, at the rate of $1,200 per annum, from the 27th July to the 4th of December, deducting the five weeks he was a member of the Legislature, and was allowed pay for four months in the service of the United States. This was a matter for the discretion of the Secretary of War. The usage is stated to be, that the pay commences from the time of starting for the seat of Government. The account, and all the circumstances, were fairly and fully stated by Mr. Buck, with no attempt at concealment, and, as he believed, in conformity with usage. The committee, in so inconsiderable a matter, cannot call in question the upright intention of the late head of the War Department, upon this statement of facts.

Eighth. The apparent attempt to connect the Secretary of State, in his official capacity, with his private interest as counsel in the Golphin claim, introduced into the last treaty with the Cherokee Indians, in 1835-'36, but excluded from the treaty by the Senate. The answers of Hon. G. W. B. Towns, (page 88,) and of Mr. Forsyth, (page 105 of journal,) need only be examined to show the high sense of honor and official responsibility with which the Secretary conducted in relation to that transaction. Even John Ross, the Cherokee chief, who was questioned by the chairman on this point, disclaims all knowledge of any means employed, or influence exerted, by any officers or agents of the executive departments, to have the stipulation respecting the Golphin claim inserted in the Cherokee treaty, (page 291 of journal.) It is proper to state, the answers of this witness were handed in the last day of receiving testimony; and from the absence of members of the committee, who were occupied by the business of the House, no opportunity was had for a cross-examination, touching implied charges against individuals, having, however, no connexion whatever with the executive departments.

There only remain unnoticed, in all the mass of testimony, five or six minor charges, which are distinctly disproved by the evidence, viz: the anonymous charge from some reckless newspaper against Mr. S. R. Hobbie, Assistant Postmaster General, of holding stock in a New York bank, which was given as a gratuity by mail contractors. The affidavits produced by Mr. Hobbie leave not a vestige of this calumny, (page 101 of journal.)

The charges by William Hobby against Paymaster General Towson, (page 107,) which are shown by Col. T. to be entire fabrications.

It is proper to state that the appendix attached to the journal of the committee has no relation to any of the acts of the executive departments. It has been printed at the request of the chairman; and the explanations of Commodore Morris, and Mr. Goldsborough, Secretary to the Navy Commissioners, the latter in the form of an argument, appended.

Much space in the journal is occupied with the statement of Hon. Balie Peyton, relating to the non-removal of John Spencer, receiver of the land office at Fort Wayne, Indiana. This case was fully explained by the reply of the Secretary of the Treasury to a call made by the House of Representatives the 30th of January, the present session. That document is appended to Mr. Peyton's statement, (page 234 of journal.) It shows the vigilance of the Secretary of the Treasury in calling upon the receiver before any complaint had been made, and in causing a thorough investigation into the matter by a special agent. So satisfactory was the result of the whole matter, that the committee apprehend, that if the Secretary had urged the removal of Mr. Spencer, and the President had caused it to be made, there would have been, from the same source, a stronger complaint for "proscription" than there now is for retaining in office.

The matter of the Decatur Bank, in Alabama, was introduced on the last day of receiving testimony before the committee, (p. 289 of journal.) The facts in the case are, that last March, before the specific circular was thought of, a contract was made by the Treasury Department with the branch of the Alabama State Bank at Decatur, which never was a deposit bank, for about half a million of State bonds purchased in behalf of the Chickasaw Indians. A part of the agreement was, that the branch bank should take such money as was paid in at Pontotoc, from time to time, for Indian lands sold there on account of the Chickasaws, and send to Washington bonds for the amount. Enough was not received to discharge the whole contract, in September last, when the bank wrote that it was willing to take its own bills in payment, instead of specie, if the Treasury Department would assent to it. The bank was accordingly advised by the Department that, to the extent of the contract, and no further, there was no objection to receiving the bills of the bank instead of specie, if the bank, to which the money was to be paid, preferred them. The Department, it appears, saw no reason why the payee might not be permitted to waive specie payment, if he pleased.

In this transaction the committee can perceive no relation to a total or partial repeal of the Treasury order, as to public lands generally, or any favor conferred on the bank or the State of Alabama. It was merely carrying into effect a contract as to proceeds of Indian lands, which was made long before the Treasury order issued, and merely assenting, under that contract, that the money to be paid to the contracting party, and not into the Treasury, might, to the extent of the contract, and no further, be paid in bills, instead of specie, if that party preferred it.

The committee have now disposed of all the material points involved in this long and laborious investigation. They regret that the brief space allowed for preparing their report did not admit of more condensation of the mass of matter before them; but, as the attention of the whole country has been called to this investigation, the committee have deemed it an indispensable duty to present, in a full and distinct form, a view of the principles on which they have conducted this examination, with a summary, from the voluminous and disconnected testimony, of all the allegations and specifications of violation of duty, and the evidence produced to sustain them.

The result of the whole is a firm conviction that, to an extent which the warmest friends of this or any other administration could not have anticipated in passing through such an ordeal, to which no other administration was ever subjected, is demonstrated, beyond question or doubt, the truth of the testimony borne by the President, in his annual message, to the "prosperous condition of the various executive departments, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted."

Equally well established, by undeniable facts, is the sincerity and uprightness of the untiring "aim" of the Chief Magistrate "to enforce in all of them a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business;" and it seems to the committee that, after this long and laborious investigation into the official conduct of the President and the heads of the departments, with the fearless invitation of the former to his once bosom friends to disclose every matter of confidence that ever existed between them, no fair mind can resist the conviction that there in reality exists "no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which the executive departments have fulfilled the objects of their creation."

The committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That, so far as has come to the knowledge of the committee, from the results of this investigation, the condition of the various executive departments is prosperous, and that they have been conducted with ability and integrity; that the President has aimed to enforce, in all of them, a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business; and that there is no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation.

VIEW OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned, members of the select committee appointed under a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 17th January last, disagreeing to, and dissenting from, the report adopted by a majority of said committee, beg leave to offer the following reasons for said disagreement and dissent, and request that the same may be entered on the journal:

1. Because the construction put, by a majority of the committee, upon the resolution of the House, has so narrowed and restrained the scope of inquiry, as, by necessary consequence, to preclude and suppress the investigation which, in the opinion of the undersigned, was most manifestly the object of the mover and advocates of the resolution, and must have been the intention of the House in its adoption.

2. Because the committee having, by various resolutions, sought from the President of the United States, and the heads of the departments, information which was deemed material to the investigation of the condition and management of those departments, and into the manner in which the executive Government has been administered in those departments, respectively, which resolutions were answered by a most extraordinary communication addressed by the President to the chairman, now entered upon the journal, declining to furnish the information asked for by the committee, and deemed indispensable to the faithful execution of the duties devolved upon them by the resolution of the House, the undersigned are without the means of justifying to their own minds the reasonings and conclusions which the majority of the committee have adopted in their report.

3. Because many documents and papers, and much evidence sought by the committee in the resolutions addressed to the heads of departments, have not been obtained by the committee, for reasons assigned in the answers given to those resolutions, or otherwise apparent on the journal; and, in the absence of such documents, papers, and evidence, the truth or falsehood of the allegations of numerous abuses or neglects of duty in the administration of said departments cannot, at this time, be arrived at.

4. Because, by the decision of the majority of the committee, expressed in numerous votes, in reference to various subjects, testimony deemed by the undersigned altogether material to the investigation of the "condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all the causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said departments, or their bureaus or offices, or any of their officers or agents, of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured and impaired the public service and interest;" has been determined to be inadmissible, and has not been permitted to be produced before said committee, so as to enable the committee to pronounce, either affirmatively or negatively, upon the truth of the various matters referred to their consideration by the resolution under which they are constituted.

5. Because on many, if not most, of the subjects which were referred to the attention of the committee, as well from the want of time as from the absence of alleged existing testimony, the investigation has been manifestly and necessarily incomplete and imperfect, and no just, impartial, and satisfactory judgment can be pronounced thereon.

6. Because the report of the majority does express opinions and conclusions upon partial and imperfect investigation, which should be the result only of the most satisfactory examination of the various and complicated subjects to which such conclusions and opinions relate.

7. Because the report of the majority, under the limited and imperfect examinations which have been given of the matters referred to the consideration of the committee under the broad scope of the resolution of the House, does express judgments and opinions, as the result of conviction upon full investigation, instead of submitting only the journal of the proceedings of the committee for the action and judgment of the House thereon.

Inasmuch, therefore, as the undersigned cannot, consistently with their own convictions of duty to themselves, and their sense of obligation to the House and to the country, unite in the reasoning and conclusions of opinion adopted by the majority, and have no opportunity otherwise to express their disagreement with, and dissent thereto, they respectfully resort to this only mode, at the very moment of adopting their report, to declare their opinion that the committee are only warranted, by the progress and present state of the investigation with which they are charged, in reporting the journal, unaccompanied by any expression of opinions or judgment of the matters referred to them.

LEVI LINCOLN.
ROBERT B. CAMPBELL.

I concur fully in the foregoing, except in the opinion that the committee should have reported only its journal of proceedings.

HENRY A. WISE.

REPORT OF MR. WISE.

The undersigned, of the committee to which was referred "so much of the President's message as relates to the condition of the various executive departments," &c., begs leave to show his reasons for dissenting from the majority.

The resolution of the House of Representatives, under which this committee was appointed, was passed on the 17th day of January. On the 20th of that month, the chairman, who was serving during the session of the House on another committee of investigation, was notified by the Clerk of the House of the appointment of this committee, after his calling at the Clerk's office and requesting to be furnished with a copy of the resolution and of the list of committee.

On the 21st day of January the committee was organized, and proceeded to its labors. The resolution, it was thought, embraced every species of legitimate inquiry, in the fullest extent, into the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which the departments, or their bureaus and offices, or any of their officers or agents, of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured and impaired the public service and interest. The scope of inquiry was vast and unlimited; the time in which to institute and accomplish investigation was very short and insufficient. The call for this investigation had, in fact, been made early during the past session of Congress, and was not granted until within six weeks of the close of this. Many subjects, therefore, of the highest importance, which required the strictest scrutiny and the longest time, the testimony as to which was to be obtained from the greatest distance of the extremes of the Union, could not be touched in the short period left for the execution of the task of this committee. There were many subjects, however, of deep interest, the evidence as to which was known to be near at hand, which could be inquired into; and, accordingly, several of those were proposed to be examined.

Among these, the first in importance, and the first proposed to be examined, were the subjects of executive patronage to the public press, of executive appointments to office, of the application of contingent items of appropriation, of irregular expenditures, allowances, and payments, and of sinecures. Accordingly, at the first meeting, four distinct resolutions were offered on these subjects, respectively. They were submitted, as appears by the journal, in the following form:

"1. Resolved, That the heads of the several departments be required to furnish this committee with a statement showing the sums of money paid within the year ending on the 1st of December, last, by such departments, respectively, their agents or deputies, to printers or editors of newspapers, specifying the names and residences of such printers and editors, and also the names and places of publication of the newspapers owned or published by them, and showing the services or considerations for which such sums have been paid, giving each item as stated in the accounts of such printer or editor.

"2. Resolved, That the President of the United States and the heads of the several executive departments be required to furnish this committee with a list or lists of all officers, or agents, or deputies, who have been appointed, or employed and paid, since the 4th of March, 1829, to the 1st of December last, by the President or either of said heads of departments, respectively, without nomination to or the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States; showing the names of such officers, agents, or deputies, the sums paid to each, the services rendered, and by what authority appointed and paid.

"3. Resolved, That the heads of the several departments be required to furnish this committee with a statement showing the various amounts of money paid within the last four years, ending on the 1st of December last, for contingencies, whether appropriated or not by law, to whom and for what paid; showing whether any, and, if any, what appropriations have been changed from specific to other objects of expenditure than those for which they were made, and how such change was effected; and showing the amount of irregular expenditures, allowances, or payments, of every description whatever, if any, made by said departments, respectively, since the 4th day of March, 1829, to the 1st of December, 1836, by Treasury warrant or draft, or otherwise, to whom and for what made, and the authority and reasons for such expenditures, &c.

"4. Resolved, That the heads of the several departments be required to furnish this committee with a list of all officers, agents, or deputies, who have, since the 4th of March, 1829, to the 1st of December last, within the departments, respectively, received salaries, pay, or emoluments of any kind, without rendering service to the Government; who have received salaries, &c., without being in office; whose commissions have been antedated; who held other stations or appointments, State or Federal, when receiving pay for particular offices or agencies, or who have been engaged in private employment whilst receiving pay from, and rendering no services to, the Government of the United States; with the names of such officers, or agents, or deputies, the sums or salaries paid to each, and the time of service of each, respectively."

These resolutions were severally taken up in turn, and amended, as appears by the journal of the committee:

"The resolutions submitted by Mr. Wise, at the previous meeting, were taken up: and the first resolution being under consideration, Mr. Mann moved to amend the same by striking out the word 'required,' and inserting the word 'requested.'

"Mr. Pearce moved to amend the amendment by striking out 'requested,' and inserting 'directed,' and the question being taken by ayes and nays, was carried in the affirmative, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Pearce, Hannegan, Lincoln, Wise—4.
NAYS—Messrs. Parks, Mann, Chaney—3.

"The question recurring on the amendment as amended, to strike out 'required' and insert 'directed,' it was carried in the affirmative, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Pearce, Hannegan, Lincoln, Wise—4.

"NAYS—Messrs. Parks, Mann, Chaney—3.

"Mr. Mann moved further to amend the first resolution, by inserting after the words 'agents or deputies' the words 'without authority of law, if any.'

"Mr. Wise moved to amend the amendment by substituting therefor 'with or without authority of law;' and the question being taken, said motion was lost, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Lincoln, Wise—2.

"NAYS—Messrs. Pearce, Muhlenberg, Hannegan, Parks, Chaney—5.

"The question recurring on inserting Mr. Mann's amendment, viz: 'without authority of law, if any,' it was carried in the affirmative, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Pearce, Muhlenberg, Hannegan, Parks, Mann, Chaney—6.

"NAYS—Messrs. Lincoln, Wise—2.

"Mr. Mann moved further to amend the 1st resolution, by adding, at the end of the same, the words 'and the reasons for making such payments;' which was carried in the affirmative, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Pearce, Muhlenberg, Hannegan, Parks, Mann, Chaney—6.

"NAYS—Messrs. Lincoln, Wise—2.

"Mr. Wise submitted the following amendment to the 1st resolution: 'and showing the sums of money legally paid within the year ending on the 1st of December last, by such departments, respectively, their agents or deputies, to printers or editors of newspapers, specifying the names and residence of such printers and editors, and also the names and places of publication of the newspapers owned or published by them, and showing the services and considerations for which such sums have been paid; giving each item as stated in the accounts of such printer or editor.'

"Which amendment was rejected, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Lincoln, Wise—2.

"NAYS—Messrs. Pearce, Muhlenberg, Hannegan, Parks, Mann, Chaney—6.

"The question recurring on adopting the 1st resolution, as amended, it was carried in the affirmative, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Pearce, Muhlenberg, Hannegan, Parks, Mann, Chaney—6.

"NAYS—Messrs. Lincoln, Wise—2.

"Mr. Mann moved to amend the second resolution, by inserting after the words '1st of December last,' the words 'if any, without authority of law.'

"Mr. Lincoln moved to amend the amendment, by adding thereto, 'or whose names are not contained in the last register of public officers, commonly called the Blue Book;' which amendment prevailed, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Muhlenberg, Hannegan, Lincoln, Chaney, Wise—5.

"NAYS—Messrs. Pearce, Parks, Mann—3.

"Mr. Wise moved further to amend the amendment, by inserting before the word 'without' the words 'with or,' so as to read 'with or without authority of law;' which motion was lost, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Lincoln, Wise—2.

"NAYS—Messrs. Pearce, Muhlenberg, Hannegan, Parks, Mann, Chaney—6.

"Mr. Mann moved further to amend the second resolution, by adding at the end thereof the following: 'and what reasons for such appointments;' which prevailed, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Pearce, Muhlenberg, Hannegan, Parks, Mann, Chaney—6.

"NAYS—Messrs. Lincoln, Wise—2.

"Mr. Hannegan moved the following additional resolution, viz:

"Resolved, That the various executive officers, in replying to the foregoing resolutions, be requested, at the same time, to furnish a statement of the period at which any innovations, not authorized by law, (if such exist,) had their origin, their causes, and the necessity which has required their continuance.

"And the question being taken, said resolution was adopted, as follows:

"NAYS—Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—2."

The obvious and proper design of the first of these resolutions was to ascertain the amount per annum of executive patronage to the press. That amount, judging from the evidence contained in the last Blue Book, was deemed to be great, and sufficient to influence, to a dangerous extent, the political sentiments and power of the public press, particularly at the seat of Government, and the great number of country or village newspapers throughout the United States; especially when systematically applied to party purposes, in conjunction with the patronage of the appointing and removing power to and from office. The resolution contemplated an inquiry into the abuses of the power to employ and pay printers, and into the corruption of applying the lawful authority to do so to the sinister purposes of political parties, as well as into the mere illegal payments which may have been made to public printers. Though, as originally presented, it embraced the latter inquiry, yet it regarded it as of minor consequence, when compared with the first. In all cases, the abuses and corruptions which are perpetrated and committed under the color of law are more aggravated, inveterate, and dangerous, than those which grow out of clear violations of official duty. Usurpations are rare; they are generally flagrant, and they rarely ever are the cause, but oftener the effect, of corruption. The latter first steals into the administration of the laws, and then prepares the pretext for the open aggressions of the former. The few accounts which may have been paid to printers beyond what the law allows were nothing, compared to the corrupting and bribing abuse of legal authority to discharge a long-established press, with extensive circulation and numerous subscribers, from the printing of the laws and public advertisements, because its politics happened not to agree with the powers that be, or with the men who were to be in power; and to establish, with pledges of the Government patronage, a new press, without subscribers and without circulation, except through the franking privilege of privileged partisans, for the uses of party; and to organize these pensioned presses, thus brought into existence by the generating power of corruption, into a combined phalanx of types from one end of the Union to the other, speaking the same words, echoing the same sentiments, praising or denouncing the same men or measures, dependent, and living, and moving, and having their being, in the same fiat of executive will! Better that the laws should never be published, like those of Caligula, so that the people should never read them, than that the press, which has been called the palladium of civil liberty, should be subsidized and corrupted. It should be the organ of information—the fountain of intelligence; it should be as independent as truth, as free as knowledge. "The freedom of the press is one of the great bulwarks of liberty, and can never be restrained but by despotic Governments." The 'most hampering restraint upon it is that imposed by party pains and penalties. These views were urged and pressed upon your committee. A majority replied that they had no authority to examine, and there was no necessity to inquire into the legal acts of the executive officers; that it was notorious that the present executive administration did distribute its patronage to presses favorable to its party purposes; and more than one of the committee was ready to enter a cognovit to the charge of dismissing one press, and establishing or employing another, for reason of their politics. Accordingly, the amendment to the first resolution was offered, to insert after the words "agents or deputies" the words "without authority of law, if any."

Against this it was urged that the amendment changed and restricted the inquiry almost totally; that it would call on the heads of departments to criminate themselves, when properly they should be called on for information only, and not for guilt; and that the committee would thereby make them the judges of their own acts, and deprive itself of the power to judge for itself, if they chose to respond generally "not guilty," without reporting simply the facts. The amendment, however, was carried by the votes of six members, friendly to the administration. Every form of amendment was offered in vain to counteract the effect of this amendment, as the journal shows. (See pages 5, 6, 7, 8.)

The second resolution embraced a subject of the most vital importance. An officer is one who performs public service and receives pay or emolument from the Government. The constitution prescribes the mode in which officers shall be appointed. The principle is sacred and vital to a republic, that the public officers, their pay and their duties, shall be known to the people and their representatives, in order that they may be duly responsible, and at all times amenable to them. It was represented to the committee that many officers or agents had been appointed, employed, and paid, by the Executive, who were not known to the constitution and the laws, and whose emoluments were not appropriated by bills before they were employed and paid by the President, without the advice and consent of the Senate or nomination, and without the appointment of such officers having been vested in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments. There is said and believed to be a long list of such officers and agents, almost as numerous as those legally appointed—such as commercial agents, special commissioners of various kinds, with a large compensation, as in the case of those to settle the controversy of the Michigan and Ohio boundary line, and innumerable other agents whose pay and service are never reported, and are known only to the Executive. It was proposed to ascertain the entire list of such appointments since the 4th of March, 1829, when the President became responsible for the faithful execution of the laws, with a view of then examining the authority of law, for appointing, employing, and paying, any or all of them. To this resolution, also, a similar amendment was proposed, by inserting the words, "if any, without authority of law." The same objections were urged again to this amendment of the 2d, as to the amendment of the 1st. On the one hand, it called upon the President and heads of departments to criminate themselves; or, on the other, it made them their own judges of their own acts, and gave them the opportunity of acquitting themselves. These objections were again unavailing, and the amendment to the 2d resolution also was adopted.

After these and various other amendments, and after adopting an additional or fifth resolution, by a vote of 6 to 2, which was regarded at the time by some of the committee as intended to give the departments an opportunity, and to call on them for a labored defence of the errors, if any, of their administration, the resolutions, as amended, were adopted, and ordered to be communicated according to their tenor.

These five resolutions were adopted on Monday, the 23d January. On Tuesday, the 24th of January, the chairman of the committee addressed to the President the following letter and resolutions enclosed therein:

"WASHINGTON, January 24, 1837.

"SIR: I am ordered by the select committee of the House of Representatives appointed to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, &c., to communicate to you the enclosed resolutions.

Respectfully, &c.

HENRY A. WISE, Chairman.

TO ANDREW JACKSON,

President of the United States."

The following are the resolutions enclosed as above:

"2d. Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, and the heads of the several executive departments be directed, to furnish this committee with a list or lists of all officers, or agents, or deputies, who have been appointed, or employed and paid, since the 4th of March, 1829, to the 1st of December last, (if any, without authority of law, or whose names are not contained in the last printed register of public officers, commonly called the 'Blue Book,') by the President, or either of the said heads of departments, respectively, and without nomination to or the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States; showing the names of such officers, or agents, or deputies; the sums paid to each; the services rendered; and by what authority appointed and paid; and what reasons for such appointments.

"Resolved, That the various executive officers, in replying to the foregoing resolution, be requested, at the same time, to furnish a statement of the period at which any innovations, not authorized by law, (if such exist,) had their origin, their causes, and the necessity which has required their continuance."

On Friday, the 27th of January, the chairman of the committee was called upon by Mr. Mann to testify as a witness; and the following question was propounded to him, to wit:

"Do you, of your own knowledge, know of any act, by either of the heads of the executive departments, which is either corrupt, or a violation of their official duties?"

Another member of the House, also, the honorable John Bell, had been called on as a witness before the committee.

The chairman was proceeding to answer, when the private secretary of the President entered the committee-room, and presented a letter, signed by the President, as follows:

"WASHINGTON CITY, January 26, 1837.

"SIR: I received, on the evening of the 24th instant, your letter, covering a copy of certain resolutions purporting to have been adopted by a committee of the House of Representatives, of which you are chairman, and request that you will lay before that committee this, my reply, which I hasten to make.

"It appears, by the published proceedings of the House of Representatives, that the committee of which you are chairman was appointed on your motion. The resolution offered by you, and finally adopted by the House, raised a direct issue with that part of my annual message in which I held the following language: 'Before concluding this paper, I think it due to the various executive departments to bear testimony of their prosperous condition, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce, in all of them, a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business; and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the object of their creation.' Your resolution is in the following words: 'Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the "condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation," be referred to a select committee to consist of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said departments, or their bureaus or offices, or any of their officers, or agents, of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have failed or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured and impaired the public service and interest; and that said committee, in its inquiries, may refer to such periods of time as to them may seem expedient and proper.' It also appears, from the published proceedings of the House, that this resolution was accompanied and supported by a speech of considerable length, in which you preferred many severe but vague charges of corruption and abuse in the executive departments. The resolutions adopted by the committee, as well as that adopted by the House itself, must be taken in connexion with your introductory speech, which gives a character to the whole proceeding. When thus regarded, it is obvious that, by the resolution of the House, an issue is made with the President of the United States; as he had alleged, in his annual message, that the heads of the executive departments had performed their official duties with ability and integrity. In your speech you denied this; you charged them with manifold corruptions and abuses of trust, as you had done in former speeches, to which you referred; and you demanded an investigation through the medium of a committee. Certain other members of Congress, as appears by the published debates, united with you in these accusations; and for the purpose of ascertaining their truth or falsehood, the committee you demanded was ordered to be raised, and you were placed at its head. The first proceeding of the investigating committee is to pass a series of resolutions, which, though amended in their passage, were, as understood, introduced by you, calling on the President and the heads of the departments—not to answer to any specific charge; not to explain any alleged abuse; not to give information as to any particular transaction; but, assuming that they have been guilty of the charges alleged, calls upon them to furnish evidence against themselves!

"After the reiterated charges you have made, it was to have been expected that you would have been prepared to reduce them to specifications, and that the committee would then proceed to investigate the matters alleged. But, instead of this, you resort to generalities even more vague than your original accusations; and, in open violation of the constitution, and of that well-established and wise maxim, 'that all men are presumed to be innocent until proven guilty,' according to the established rules of law, you request myself and the heads of the departments to become our own accusers, and to furnish the evidence to convict ourselves; and this call purports to be founded on the authority of that body in which alone, by the constitution, the power of impeaching us is vested! The heads of departments may answer such a request as they please, provided they do not withdraw their own time, and that of the officers under their direction, from the public business, to the injury thereof. To that business I shall direct them to devote themselves, in preference to any illegal and unconstitutional call for information, no matter from what source it may come, or however anxious they may be to meet it. For myself, I shall repel all such attempts as an invasion of the principles of justice, as well as of the constitution; and I shall esteem it my sacred duty to the people of the United States to resist them as I would the establishment of a Spanish inquisition.

"If, after all the severe accusations contained in the various speeches of yourself and your associates, you are unwilling of your own accord to bring specific charges, then I request your committee to call yourself and your associates, and every other member of Congress who has made the general charge of corruption, to testify, before God and our country, whether you or they know of any specific corruption or abuse of trust in the executive departments; and, if so, what it is. If you are able to point to any case where there is the slightest reason to suspect corruption or abuse of trust, no obstacle which I can remove shall be interposed to prevent the fullest scrutiny by all legal means. The offices of all the departments will be opened to you, and every proper facility furnished for this purpose.

"I hope, sir, we shall at last have your charges, and that you will proceed to investigate them, not like an inquisitor, but in the accustomed mode. If you either will not make specific accusations, or if, when made, you attempt to establish them by making freemen their own accusers, you will not expect me to countenance your proceedings. In the short period which remains of my official duty, I shall endeavor, as I have heretofore endeavored, to fulfil the obligations of that oath of office by which I engaged, 'to the best of my ability, to preserve, protect, and defend, the constitution of the United States;' and for this and other reasons of the most solemn character, I shall, on the one hand, cause every possible facility consistent with law and justice to be given to investigation of specific, tangible charges; and, on the other, shall repudiate all attempts to evade the just rights of the executive departments, and of the individuals composing the same. If, after all your clamor, you will make no specific charges, or bring no proof of such as shall be made, you and your associates must be regarded by the good people of the United States as the authors of unfounded calumnies; and the public servants whom you have assailed will, in the estimation of all honorable men, stand fully acquitted.

"In the mean time, I cannot but express my astonishment that members of Congress should call for information as to the names of persons to whom contingent moneys are paid, and the objects of those payments, when there are six standing committees, under the seventy-seventh rule of the House of Representatives, whose special duties are to examine annually into all the details of those expenditures in each of the executive departments. The like remark is applicable to some other branches of the information sought by you, ample details in respect to which are to be found in the reports laid before Congress, and now on your files, and to which I recommend you to have recourse.

I am, respectfully, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

To the Hon. HENRY A. WISE,
Chairman of the Investigating Committee on the abuses and frauds of the executive departments—charged!"

By this letter, it appears that the President had been distinctly informed of the proceedings of the committee. The chairman remarked upon the fact, and inquired whether any member of the committee had given information to the President of its proceedings. The Hon. Abijah Mann, jr. confessed immediately that he had conversed with the President on the subject of its proceedings, and was immediately put under examination, upon oath, in relation thereto.

"First question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Mann:

"Will you please to state to this committee all you know respecting conversations held with the President of the United States, either by yourself or any other member of this committee, in relation to the proceedings of this committee, the resolution communicated to him by the chairman, and the letter from him of this morning?"

"Answer by Mr. Mann:

"I saw the President of the United States, I believe, on Tuesday evening of this week, at his house; and, in a general conversation; he inquired from me what progress this committee were making under the resolution of the House of Representatives; and I informed him that the chairman had submitted a series of four resolutions, of a broad character, as I considered them, and that the committee had amended them, with a view, as I believed, of limiting them to a more practical and definite operation, so as to enable those to whom they were addressed to give answers thereto at the present session, by inserting the words 'without authority of law' in some of said resolutions, as words of limitation and restriction.

"The President then told me that he would, in proper time, send his answer to this committee, after he should receive a copy of the resolutions. This, I believe, is fully the substance of the conversation to which I have referred. I cannot remember the words used, either by myself or the President. The President told me that he would desire this committee to examine, upon oath, such gentlemen as, had charged corruptions and abuses against the heads of the executive departments."

The minority of your committee cannot but remark fully upon the extraordinary character of this letter from the President, and of the proceedings of the committee in obedience to its request, and to his will as indicated therein, and to a member of the committee in conversation. Though it is directed to Mr. Wise, as chairman of the committee, whose organ merely he was in communicating its resolutions calling upon the President officially for information, yet it addresses itself to him in every relation of chairman of a committee, of representative in Congress, and of an individual man. Without stopping to comment upon the utter impropriety of his not discriminating at all between these relations, so essentially different and distinct, further than simply to remark that this is the first time a Chief Magistrate, in officially addressing a public functionary, has ever lost sight of the officer in regarding the individual person whom he addressed, the undersigned proceeds at once to show: That this letter is an official assumption of authority by the Executive over the proceedings of the House of Representatives, and over the proceedings of one of its committees; that it is an official attack upon the privileges of members of both Houses of Congress; and that it opposes an unauthorized resistance to the just powers of the House and its committee, in direct hostility to inviolable principles necessary to the administration of a free Government.

Your committee has no power to speak of its personal attack upon individual members.

The letter is official. It is the "REPLY" of the President of the United States to a letter of a chairman of a committee, covering a copy of certain resolutions purporting to have been adopted by that committee of the House of Representatives. The letter enclosing the resolutions of the committee was signed by the writer, as chairman. The reply of the President is signed precisely as he signed the "last annual message," and all the messages sent by him to Congress, and was directed on the envelope, and at the end of the letter itself, on the inside, to the chairman of the committee; as the latter direction, in the point and punctuation of passion itself, will emphatically show. It requests the chairman to lay it before the committee, and the committee placed it upon its journal as an official communication from the Executive, to be reported to the House.

In this official letter the President assumes authority over the proceedings of the House. In the first place, he therein assumes to supervise those proceedings. He says this committee was appointed on the motion of its chairman. What authority has the President for noticing, what necessity has he for inquiring, on whose motion a committee of the House is appointed?

That the House had the power to appoint this committee, no one will deny; that any member had the right to move for its appointment, it was once thought no one would oppose; and that the motion for its appointment by one instead of another member constituted any part of its illegality or impropriety, was never imagined before, though now we know its paternity constitutes its odium to the President. Now we have evidence that the President of the United States has not confined his consideration to the results of the proceedings of Congress, or of either House; but he assumes to look behind those results, and to supervise and consider what each House, for itself alone, by the constitution, has power to determine—the proceedings by which it arrived at those results. He has not looked at the resolution merely of the House, but to its mover and its advocates, and their speeches on the floor. He has interpreted it, not by its own words, its own declared sense—has expounded it, not by counter-propositions which failed, by substitutes which were refused, or by amendments which were rejected; but by speeches made at the time, and other speeches at different times referred to, and those entirely on one side only of the question discussed. How improper it is, and to what pernicious consequences it may lead, for the Executive thus to look beyond the order, the resolution, or the vote of either House, or both, the nation may clearly infer from how unfortunate it has been that a particular member was the mover for the appointment of this committee in this instance, and that the resolution from which it derived its duties and its powers was advocated by him and his "associates."

Again: The President assumes to control as well as to supervise the proceedings of the House.

What did the House do, and what did it refuse to do? It referred a part of the "last annual message" to a select committee, WITH POWER TO SEND FOR PERSONS AND PAPERS, and with INSTRUCTIONS TO INQUIRE INTO THE CONDITION of the various executive departments, &c. Whilst the resolution proposing this inquiry was pending, an amendment was offered by Mr. Pearce, of Rhode Island, to instruct the committee to inquire only into such SPECIFIC causes of complaint as might be alleged against the integrity of the administration.

The conflicting propositions—the one to inquire simply whether the CONDITION of the DEPARTMENTS was good or bad, the other to examine into the truth or falsehood of specific charges which might be alleged—were fully discussed in the House of Representatives. On the one hand, it was contended by the mover of the resolution which finally prevailed, and by his "associates" who advocated its passage, that there was reason to believe the administration of the Government was corrupt, and the executive departments to be in the worst condition. But whether corrupt or not, and whether that condition was good or bad, it was the duty of the representatives of the people, at all times when called on, TO INQUIRE INTO THE CONDITION OF THE GOVERNMENT.

"That this Government was instituted for the common benefit, protection, and security of the people; that its form was adopted as one most effectually secured AGAINST THE DANGER OF MISADMINISTRATION; that all power is vested in, and consequently derived from, the people; THAT MAGISTRATES ARE THEIR TRUSTEES AND SERVANTS, AND AT ALL TIMES AMENABLE TO THEM." That if neither House of Congress could nor would inquire into the official conduct and administration of executive officers, the people, who could not inquire in their aggregated or conventional capacity; and the States, which cannot, from their own organization and that of the Federal Government, institute inquiries at all efficiently, could never be informed of the official conduct of their federal officers; and these officers would, in effect, become irresponsible, from their acts, except such as they might of themselves disclose, being unknown.

In addition to this general reason founded upon the right of the people and of the States to know the true condition of their Federal Government, and the actions and doings of its officers, and upon the duty of the representatives of both the people and the States to report to them upon that condition of Government, and official conduct of public officers, the constitution expressly and imperatively declares the President "SHALL, from time to time, give to the Congress information of THE STATE OF THE UNION;" and thence it is clearly implied that the Congress HAS THE RIGHT TO CALL upon the Chief Magistrate for information of the state of the Union.

Not only so, but the constitution makes the President, Vice President, and ALL civil officers of the United States, REMOVABLE FROM OFFICE ON IMPEACHMENT; and it declares that the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES shall have the SOLE POWER OF IMPEACHMENT. How could the House ever know whether the President, Vice President or any civil officer of the United States, deserved to be impeached, without inquiring into their conduct, and knowing its merits and demerits? How could the House ever know whether the President had obeyed the solemn injunction of the constitution, "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed," that clause upon which the President has been wont to rely for the exercise of so many extraordinary powers, WITHOUT INQUIRING how he had discharged that important duty?

Further: "THE CONGRESS SHALL HAVE POWER to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, THE TERRITORY OR OTHER PROPERTY BELONGING TO THE UNITED STATES." And how shall it know what rules and regulations are necessary to PROTECT THE PUBLIC LANDS, THE PUBLIC MONEY, unless it possesses the means of acquiring the information necessary, it may be, to protect them from the abuses and corruption of executive officers to whom are confided their sales and their safe-keeping? How shall the House ever know without inquiry?

In reply to all this, it was urged that there was NO NECESSITY for the resolution, because the STANDING RULES of the House prescribing the jurisdiction of committees already required the very inquiries proposed by the resolution to be instituted; that the resolution took cognizance of all kinds of complaints FROM ALL QUARTERS, and there would be no end to the investigation; that there was no CONSTITUTIONAL POWER IN THE HOUSE to institute general inquiries; that such a power existed alone in the Executive as to the departments; that it was unusual to institute inquiries into the condition of the executive departments just as a President was about to retire from office; and that the resolution impugned the veracity of the President, and the integrity of him and his subordinate officers. Such were the arguments urged against the resolution, and in favor of the amendment.

These arguments were met by contending that the resolution did not authorize the committee appointed under it to TRY any officer of any department, on any CHARGE whatever. Impeachment in the House rather corresponded with indictment at common law in the courts. Impeachment must be specific. But a resolution of inquiry was not an impeachment; and, so far from implying even a charge, it imported, "ex vi termini," a want of knowledge upon which to found a charge or specification. It did not even necessarily imply an investigation for the purpose of finding grounds for a charge. Inquiry sought properly for a good condition, and a faithful conduct of public officers; and only exposed a bad condition and corrupt conduct, if such should be found on due and fair investigation. And in this consisted the distinction between inquiry and inquisition. Inquisition seeks for the criminal motives and conduct of private individuals in their private affairs, and often extorts confession of guilt from pain, where there is no crime. Inquiry into the condition and conduct of public affairs is a right of legislators. Inquisition into the condition and conduct of private affairs is no right, even of the sovereign power. Inquisition would violate the 4th article of the amendments of the constitution. The resolution of inquiry did not invade the security of these rights, as was urged by those in favor of the amendment proposed. That article reads: "The rights of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated."

This right is the right of the people. Are the executive departments and their officers the people? They belong to the people; though the history of Governments proves too sadly that, without constant vigilance and strict superintendence over them by the people or by their representatives, the people soon become to belong to them! "To be secure in their persons houses, papers, and effects." Are the departments the private houses, papers, and effects, of the executive officers?

Had these officers the right to be secure in them from all inquiry? It was thought that they were mere trustees and servants, who might be called on at any time to give an account of their stewardship. The inquiry proposed by the resolution was not deemed unreasonable.

What were the standing rules of the House? The 57th rule made it the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means "to examine into the state of the several executive departments, &c., and to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the departments and the accountability of their officers." The 65th rule made it the duty of the Committee on Public Expenditures to examine into the state of the several public departments, &c. The 77th rule makes it the duty of the Committees on Public Accounts, respectively, to examine into the state of the accounts, &c., submitted to them, and to report particularly—

"Whether the expenditures of the respective departments are justified by law. Whether the claims from time to time satisfied and discharged by the respective departments are supported by sufficient vouchers establishing their justness both as to their character and amount."

"Whether such claims have been discharged out of funds appropriated therefor; and whether all moneys have been disbursed in conformity with appropriation laws; and whether any, and what, provisions are necessary to be adopted, to provide more perfectly for the proper application of public moneys, and to secure the Government from demands unjust in their character, or extravagant in their amount."

"And it shall be, moreover, the duty of the said committees to report, from time to time, whether any, and what, retrenchment can be made in the expenditures of the several departments, without detriment to the public service; whether any, and what, abuses at any time exist in the failure to enforce the payment of moneys which may be due to the United States from public defaulters or others; and to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the several departments, and the accountability of their officers."

Such were some of the rules, the standing rules of the House; and they are quoted to show the NECESSITY and the PRECEDENT for general and searching inquiry. The second argument was inconsistent with the first, that the resolution of inquiry should specify charges. In these standing rules were committees of inquiry instituted without oath or affirmation, or notice or specification of charges. If the resolution of the House was inquisitorial, these rules were, and had been, from the earliest period of the existence of the House itself, STANDING INQUISITIONS! There was the duty enjoined to examine into the STATE of the several executive departments. There was a search for ANY and WHATEVER abuses might be found to exist, and a report of them required. Was it ever dreamed before that these standing rules were inquisitorial? No! They were the institutions of wise and jealous patriots, to insure that "eternal vigilance" which is the price of liberty!

To the argument that there was no necessity, however, for the resolution of inquiry whilst these rules remained, it was urged that, though these rules instituted precisely the same kind of inquiry as did the resolution, and with no more specification or intimation, even of charges, yet they were not so comprehensive or extensive. They related to the state of the several public DEPARTMENTS only. The resolution proposed to reach acts and proceedings of officers not to be found in the DEPARTMENTS—such acts as have been kept from the record. The resolution was intended to reach agents in fact who were not officers of the Government in form—to ascertain the public duties performed by persons not known to the laws, and not responsible at all for any duty, by bond or otherwise—to find out by whom these duties had been performed, by whose order, how performed, for what compensation, and by whom paid.

The duties of these committees related particularly to appropriations only, to the conformity of disbursements with the laws, and to subjects of economy and expenditure. They did not embrace fully the delicate subject of common honesty and purity in the administration of the Government.

But the truth was, these committees never had performed the duties assigned to them. Some of the Committees on Public Accounts had failed to sit or act at all. They had generally been composed of very good friends of the President and the administration, and generally had shown their full confidence in both, by holding neither accountable to themselves or to others. It was true one member of one of these committees had, during the last winter, exposed some astonishing items, in the accounts of the Department of State particularly; but, with the exception of his labors, the country had enjoyed the benefit of no efficient superintendence over public expenditures whatever.

In answer to the third objection, it was replied that the resolution was no broader than the President's own message, and used its own language for the greater part. It was shown that, though more extended, it was quite as specific as any resolutions of inquiry which had ever preceded it. For example, what was the resolution under which the celebrated Post Office Committee, which exposed such stupendous fraud, corruption, and maleadministration, was appointed?

"Mr. Connor, by leave, submitted, June 26, 1834, the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine the condition and proceedings of the Post Office Department, with power to send for persons and papers," &c.

What could be more general and indefinite! Not to quote further precedents from the journals of Congress, which in some sense might be extended ex parte, and in favor of its own power, an executive authority on the point was cited—an authority which, with the President, should have had the greatest possible weight, not only because it was his own, but because it was his when just "fresh from the people," who had just triumphed in a severe struggle with officers who were accused in their places with being corrupt, and whose abuses the President was elected to reform, and pledged himself to reform. In his first message to Congress, in December, 1829, the present Chief Magistrate himself held this strong republican language:

"In connexion with this subject," [frauds on the Treasury], "I invite the attention of Congress to a general and minute inquiry into the condition of the Government, with a view to ascertain what offices could be dispensed with, what expenses retrenched, and what improvements may be made in the organization of its various parts, to secure the proper responsibility of public agents, and promote efficiency and justice in all its operations."

If this INVITATION was meant SINCERELY, why now the President's opposition to a "general and minute inquiry," when his recommendation has never been pursued, without a specific bill of impeachment first laid, which could not possibly be found without a previous inquiry for facts? Have the uses and abuses of power changed his opinions, or is it because he himself is now implicated?

One of the very objects of a resolution of inquiry may be to ascertain and establish facts upon which to found specific charges. If members knew already, there would be no necessity to inquire. A member might know, generally, that particular information was within the knowledge of a certain witness; that witness might be an executive officer. What authority would the member alone have to compel that witness to disclose to him facts, circumstances, particulars of time, place, and sums—every article of narration necessary to constitute a specific charge? If the charge should be inaccurately laid, the probata would not agree with the allegata, and the evidence would be excluded, though it might show the deepest guilt in some other crime or misdemeanor than that charged in the specification. Such mode of inquiry upon specific complaints only would be but a trap for honest inquirers for the truth of good or bad administration. Who best know the facts which would constitute the guilt of executive officers, superior or inferior? The best witnesses are executive officers themselves—witnesses who now dare not speak—whose mouths are stopped by the hard necessity for bread—whose lips are hermetically sealed by an arbitrary proscription!

The amendment proposed to the resolution of the House, so far from inviting or challenging any one to bring forward specific charges and proof, would, under all the pains and penalties of removal from office, and of persecution, after removal, in the sanctuary of private life, ever have FORBIDDEN the BEST-INFORMED WITNESS of the truth to speak. "SPEAK IF YOU DARE!" "ACCUSE IF YOU DARE!" would have been its language, in tones not to be misunderstood by any dependent on executive patronage.

The resolution referred to ALL time. True; but the amendment proposed gave no time. A long session might be spent in threading a dark labyrinth for facts on which to found a specific complaint, when "a general and minute inquiry" would at once reveal many facts, and the witnesses be compelled to speak, and possibly be protected from proscription by the mandate of a summons and the solemnity of an oath. They might not then be excused, even in these times, for telling the WHOLE truth in its proper garb.

The power to inquire into the condition of Government was proved to be in Congress, or nowhere under the constitution. The power to inquire into crimes of PRIVATE individuals, even against the laws and treaties of the United States, exists in every branch of the Government. Whence derived the Executive the powers to ferret out who burnt the Treasury buildings, and to reward the active, energetic citizen, whose sagacity and perseverance apprehended the incendiary? Whence derived the President the authority to inquire into the causes of the Seminole and Creek wars, and into the frauds of officers and individuals in purchasing Indian reservations? The power and the duty of every branch of Government to inquire generally and minutely was never before doubted or denied in the history of this Government. If half the zeal and activity to prevent and detect frauds, to ascertain and arrest the causes of Indian hostilities, or to prosecute Indian wars, had been employed, that have been systematically exerted to INQUIRE into the political opinions of men, the frontiers would not now be ravaged by savage massacres, the national honor would not have been tarnished, the national arms not disgraced, and the Government would not now be decaying with corruption and groaning under oppression.

The objection to the resolution, that it had not been introduced until the President was about to retire from office, was not correct, either in fact or principle; that resolution, in substance, had not been delayed until he was about to retire; an attempt had been repeatedly, but unsuccessfully, made to call upon him and his subordinates for due accountability the session before the present. But if not, it was thought that the very time to settle the accounts with the public servants was when they were about to leave public employment. Was it forgotten how rigidly and unsparingly the administration of his predecessor had been held accountable by Congress? An able examination of laborious search, then made, found nothing compared with the stupendous frauds, the magnificent abuses, the foul corruption, the secret guilt, the open and unblushing profligacy and extravagance, which are alleged now to despoil our Government and to disgrace its administration.

In answer to the objection, that the resolution would impugn the veracity and integrity of the President and heads of departments, it was replied that such might be its effect; but such was the argument of vassals in respect to an autocrat. That the resolution was not to try the truth of accusations on the one hand, or of self-acquittals on the other; it was simply to INQUIRE. But if it did thus impugn the Executive, so did the STANDING RULES of the House, and so did every guarantee and security which had ever been provided against the danger of maleadministration. That it was the duty of freemen not to trust, implicitly and ignorantly, every thing to rulers. And were the representatives to fail or falter in the discharge of their duty because the President, or any thing that was his, stood in the way? There was no such thing as "scandalum magnatum" in this Government. True, members were warned that heavy penalties and curses of public odium would be heaped on them in conflict with a popular Chief Magistrate, whose frown has heretofore withered and blasted most men who have dared to incur his displeasure; but with those who dared to do their duty, without fear, favor, or affection, their sense of duty was stronger than their fear or their veneration for any man or any name; they were consoled with the virtuous reflection that they who DESERVED ignominy and reproach were NOT those who honestly sought for purity in the administration of the Government which cannot live without it, but rather they who seek to conceal the corruption which is gnawing on its vitals.

Upon this discussion, the House of Representatives rejected the amendment requiring specific charges, and thereby declared that such should NOT be required before "general and minute inquiry." The President has said, in direct contradiction to this, that he will REPEL all inquiry as he would the establishment of a SPANISH INQUISITION, unless charges specific and tangible are made.

The House has declared that a member shall NOT be required to prefer an accusation BEFORE he inquires into the condition of Government; the President declares he shall be so required; and, if he does not prefer charges, or prove them when made, he denounces him and his associates as the authors of unfounded calumnies.

The House declared that inquiry should NOT be converted into impeachment; the President declares that the House shall not inquire unless it does impeach.

The House declared this committee to be NECESSARY and PROPER; the President has denounced it, in effect, to be UNNECESSARY and IMPROPER.

The House has said that the committee SHALL have power to send for persons and papers; the President has said that the heads of departments shall devote themselves to their public business in preference to any calls for information, which he was pleased to denounce as illegal and unconstitutional.

But the President has assumed not only to supervise and control the proceedings of the House; he has directly assumed to supervise, and has actually controlled, the proceedings of its committee. His letter clearly discloses that he had been informed by some one, necessarily a member of the committee too, that its first proceeding was to pass a series of resolutions; that they were introduced by the chairman; and that they were amended in a particular manner in their passage. It was believed that a system of espionage was in operation in this metropolis, and began to be felt throughout every precinct of power in the land; but it was not imagined that a member of Congress on a committee would regularly report its proceedings to the President without license to do so. That member of this committee was immediately put upon his oath, and testified that the President inquired of him for information respecting the proceedings of the committee. If he had told the Chief Magistrate of all the proceedings as particularly as he did of some of the facts, he would have informed him that the resolutions, which the chairman introduced to the committee, were in nowise obnoxious to the President's objections; he would have told him that the chairman proposed not to inquire whether he had done any act "without authority of law;" that he asked not the President to furnish evidence against himself, and imputed to him no guilt. The resolution sent to the President, as originally prepared, called for the evidence only of the public record; that of itself, it was known, would convict him, if guilty. What imputation of guilt was there in that resolution? Did it not call for information as to "particular transactions?" Did it ask the President to convict himself more than he was already convicted by the RECORD?

The President's own friends, he should have been told, interpolated the odious words "if any, without authority of law," against the consent of the mover and his "associates." The very informer who rendered these resolutions odious to the President, by telling him they were introduced by the chairman, should also have told him that the words which impute to him guilt, and which ask him to furnish evidence against himself, WERE INTRODUCED BY THE INFORMER HIMSELF.

The resolution merely called for an account of official acts, as evidenced by the public record, which every officer is bound to exhibit when called for by competent authority; the amendment called on that officer himself to pick therefrom the evidence alone which would convict him of violation of law. The OBJECT of this amendment may have been to RENDER the RESOLUTION IMPROPER, and the mover of it may have acted under instructions to do so. The undersigned will not affirm this to be so. But if the intention was not to put the committee in the wrong, in order that the President might obtain an advantage over it, by having it fully in his power to denounce its proceedings, it certainly was thought to be the intention of the President's friends, and it is but justice to their kind feelings towards him to say so, to LIMIT the call as much as possible, to make the executive officers alone the JUDGES OF THEIR OWN ACTS, and to afford them the opportunity of ACQUITTING THEMSELVES by simply replying, "WE HAVE MADE NO APPOINTMENTS, EMPLOYED NO OFFICERS OR AGENTS, PAID NONE WITHOUT AUTHORITY OF LAW." The majority of the committee took all means of forming a judgment or opinion themselves, and afforded the executive officers the opportunity of saying generally, according to their own good opinion of their own acts, "WE ARE NOT GUILTY." With this decided advantage, sought and obtained for them through THEIR OWN FRIENDS, by amendments which, though they do impute guilt, INSURE ACQUITTAL by the accused parties' own judgment, what are we to infer from their STANDING MUTE? Now that the President has NOT availed himself of this opportunity of pleading "not guilty," or FINDING HIMSELF INNOCENT, what must the world infer from his complaint against his own friends, that they called on him to furnish evidence to convict himself? Might they not dare to suggest that he has not been over-cautious in admitting that he would be obliged to convict himself, he himself being the judge of the evidence? The very object of their amendment was to afford him the chance of acquitting himself; and yet he complains that HE CANNOT DO SO, and reproaches his friends for seeking to make him his own accuser "on the authority of that body in which alone, by the constitution, the power of impeaching him and his advisers is vested." Sad dilemma, indeed, in which such obliging friends have placed him—forcing him to admit he cannot acquit himself! And one House of Congress cannot pass a declaratory resolution upon the President's acts, without impugning his motives, because it is to try; the other cannot inquire into his official conduct, though both his acts and motives have, as he alleges, been impugned, because it is to impeach! To what, then, has he resolved the Executive? To an inscrutable, irresponsible, unchecked, and unbalanced branch of the Government, which has all the power of committing every abuse of law and violation of duty with impunity, and all the power of concealment with certainty.

Here it might well be solemnly asked, if his ambition had not lately been sufficiently glutted with humbling the Senate to the desecration of its own inviolable records for his sake, not to have been insatiable in seeking to subdue also the other House of Congress, which is peculiarly the House of the people, and which for years has, in too many instances, been more than indulgent to his will? In the name of the country, he might have spared some check upon the will, and not left all a wreck—a sacrifice at the shrine of one man?

The President not only assumed to supervise the proceedings of the committee, but to control them by a bold request, which every one at all acquainted with his powerful influence well knows how to denominate an order.

It appears that the resolutions of the committee were adopted on Monday, the 23d; that Mr. Mann informed the President of the proceedings on Tuesday, the 24th, before the President received the letter of the chairman on the same evening; that then the President told him he would, in proper time, send his answer to the committee, after he should receive a copy of the resolutions; and that he would desire the committee to examine, upon oath, such gentlemen as had charged corruption and abuses against the heads of executive departments; that on Friday, the 27th, less than three days thereafter, Mr. Mann called on the chairman, and on Mr. Bell, to answer the general question "whether they, of their own knowledge, knew of any acts, by either of the executive departments, either corrupt or a violation of their official duties?" On that very day the letter of the President was handed to the chairman, whilst he was in the act of testifying; that the letter of the President itself did request the committee to call upon the chairman, and his associates, and every other member of Congress who had made the general charge of corruption, to testify, before God and our country, whether they knew of any specific corruption or abuse of trust in the executive departments; and if so, what it was; and that on Saturday, the 28th, the Hon. John Bell was sworn; and the Hon. B. Peyton and F. W. Pickens, of the House, and the Hon. John C. Calhoun and H. L. White, of the Senate, were ordered to be summoned, upon the motion of Mann. From this statement of facts it seems impossible to doubt that the President of the United States did inquire about the acts of the committee, was informed by a member of the committee concerning its proceedings; did indicate to that member, in conversation, and afterwards to the committee itself, in writing, his desire that it should call upon members of Congress to testify to the truth of their speeches made on the floor of either House in debate; that the member and the committee obeyed his desire and request, and did cause those members of Congress to be summoned to testify in the manner the President had indicated in conversation and in his letter.

Thus the President first repelled the inquiry from the Executive, and then turned it upon the two Houses of Congress. He first denounced the committee as worse than a Spanish inquisition, and then actually made his denunciation true by converting it into what he denounced. He condemned its acts as unconstitutional, and then made them so. He gave it the very character he condemned; and made its proceedings as odious as he would have them to be, in attacking the privileges of the representatives of the States and of the people. He has invaded these privileges, and violated the constitution, BY HOLDING MEMBERS OF BOTH HOUSES OF CONGRESS DIRECTLY ACCOUNTABLE TO HIM FOR WORDS SPOKEN IN DEBATE. He has called upon them to swear, before God and the country, to the truth of their speeches on the floor; thus holding them accountable, in the most odious and insulting manner, in the form of a TEST OATH. He first intimated his desire to a member of the committee, who was so swift to obey his merest wish, that the chairman was called on to swear to the truth of what he had spoken before even the official request by letter had reached the committee. Both his verbal and written, his secret and open order, were summarily obeyed by instantly summoning hoary and honored Senators and young and inexperienced Representatives, to purge themselves on oath of their contempt to the Executive! They obeyed—not the mandate of the President, or the summons of the committee, but a sense of obligation to the country, to show that their speeches were not the declamation of demagogues, not ad captandum harangues, not merely "SPARGERE VOCES," to excite false alarms or to raise a senseless clamor, but that THEY SOLEMNLY BELIEVED THE TRUTHS THEY HAD UTTERED, AND WERE READY TO SEAL THAT BELIEF WITH THEIR OATHS; at the same time protesting against the abuse and outrage upon their privileges. Happy if the OATHS of these witnesses shall not produce more direful effects than their speeches; and happier still, for the nation, if there shall be another foundation stone left for civil liberty to rest on, when the freedom of debate shall thus be destroyed!

The constitution expressly provides that "for any speech or debate, in either House, the Senators and Representatives shall not be questioned in any other place." The object of this constitutional provision was to provide for such cases as that now under consideration: cases where the Senators and Representatives might deem it their duty to comment and speak freely upon the conduct of public officers and others. Who now will dare thus to speak in debate, if he may be called by the President to swear on the holy evangelists to the truth of every suspicion which he may feel it his sacred duty to utter, under the pain and penalty of being branded, by the highest authority in the land, with the infamy of falsehood and calumny? If this be tolerated, the Representative's mind must endure the weightiest convictions, but his tongue must be silent; the people must remain ignorant of their rulers, unless he have the hardihood to peril every thing personal for their sake and the public good.

After what has been said, it is not deemed necessary to show that the President has opposed a violent resistance to the just powers of the House and its committee, in direct hostility to every principle of liberty and law, justice and right. So far as his attack has been purely personal upon members of either House, it becomes them to remember that he is honored by office and by age. But the undersigned cannot refrain from saying, that if they had spread before them the whole catalogue of executive offences against law, liberty, right, reason, justice, truth, principle, precedent, the constitution, and the country, however numerous and aggravated they may be, or have been, as the prison-houses of the departments might disclose—they would scarcely expect to find one more ruthless than this official act of the President, characterized as it is by the worst of principles, prejudices, and passions, in violation of his duty, and injurious to the public institutions and to private persons. The House, the Congress, the nation, should rebuke this act with patriotic indignation—with the indignation of freemen, of jealous lovers of liberty, and of the law by which it is secured. They should defy it as they do treason and tyranny. If this executive act and its principles be sustained, and go unrebuked—if it be settled that there shall no inquiry into the condition of the Government, without specific charges against its officers—that inquiry is trial and inquisition—that public officers are to be secure in THEIR departments, and the houses, papers, and effects, belonging to the people, as private persons are in theirs—that public officers are, as the people, free from scrutiny—that they are not subject, neither indeed can be, to reasonable accountability—that they must be impeached before they can be called on to report to the people—that select committees shall not be appointed to ascertain abuses—that agents unknown to the law may be protected, for that very reason, from all search into their conduct—that there shall be no general and minute investigation—that there is no constitutional power in the House of Representatives to inquire into the conduct of executive officers—that there shall be no inquiry, because it may impugn the veracity and integrity of the President, when that is the best of all reasons for inquiry—that inquiries shall tend to render odious those who institute them—that the President may supervise and control the proceedings of both Houses of Congress and of their committees—that he may resist their just powers—that he may convert their committees of inquiry into inquisitions upon themselves—that he may officially denounce their proceedings, grossly insult their members in the discharge of their duties, and violently trample upon their most sacred privileges—then is utterly gone all purity, all honesty in this Government, its strength, its dignity, its glory, its freedom itself!

Besides the letter of the 26th of January, the President addressed another, dated January 31st, (see 61st page of printed journal,) equally reprehensible in its tone and temper, and quite as high-handed in its assumption of authority. On the 30th of January the Hon. Hugh Lawson White, of the Senate, read a paper to the committee, assigning his reasons for consenting to testify. In that paper he used the following language:

"For many years I have been on the most intimate and confidential terms with the Chief Magistrate. We have conversed with and written to each other perhaps with as much freedom as if we had been brothers: much that has passed was, of course, highly confidential. I should hold myself disgraced by designedly bringing any matters of this kind before the public."

On the 4th of February, Mr. Mann laid the following letter before the committee, as communicated to him by the President:

"JANUARY 31, 1837.

"To the Committee of Investigation of which Mr. H. A. WISE is chairman:

"Being casually informed that Judge White, of the Senate of the United States, before the said committee of investigation into abuses, &c., charged against the executive departments, has stated that he and myself have had many confidential conversations, and intimating that there was something that would be prejudicial to me, (the President,) if disclosed, I therefore absolve him from all obligations of confidence in regard to any thing that has passed between us.

"I wish every conversation had or held with him, on all and every subject, faithfully disclosed, with the time when, and the place where; and I hope the committee will interrogate him as to every point or matter of confidence that ever existed between us.

This letter, it will be observed, is dated the 31st of January, the day after the Senator read his reasons for testifying to the committee. And, again, it is shown on the face, and by the first words of the letter, that he was quickly informed of what was done in the committee; and, again, the same man communicated the President's wishes to call on a particular witness to disclose, and to have that witness particularly interrogated.

The heads of the executive departments, in their replies to the committee, followed the courtly example of the President. In reply to the letter enclosing the five resolutions of the committee, the Secretary of State addressed the chairman of the committee the following communication:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

"SIR: I had the honor to receive your letter of the 24th instant, enclosing five resolutions adopted by the committee of which you are chairman, directing me to answer, as the head of this Department, certain inquiries therein contained. It is proper that I should remind the committee that the Secretary of State is not and cannot be put officially under the direction of any committee of Congress. As a witness, he is, like any other citizen, subject to be called upon questions touching the actual or contemplated impeachment of the Chief Magistrate, or other officer of Government, for violations of constitutional obligations. In calls for information even, it is the duty of the head of this Department to withhold it, if any should be asked for concerning portions of its business, until directed to furnish it by the President of the United States. Information which is within the power of the Department, with the exception of that which is confidential, has at all times been, with all convenient speed, furnished to any of the committees of Congress, or any of its members, whenever it has been desired. I should be most happy to consider the resolutions you have enclosed to me of this character, and to answer them accordingly; but they are so presented as to oblige me to refuse a compliance with their 'directions.' I am directed to communicate what has been done by myself or my predecessors without authority of law in the expenditures of this Department, within the period designated in them. Self-respect forbids a reply as to myself; as to my predecessors, I should not become their accuser if I thought they had committed errors, and certainly shall not vindicate them while following their example. That the committee may judge for itself whether any of the expenditures made in this Department are contrary to law, I have the honor to make known to them, through you, the sources where information is to be obtained of all the money that has been expended under its direction. The enclosed documents will effect that purpose, and will, at the same time, I trust, protect me from any false inferences for refusing to be put under question as to the legality of my own conduct.

"If, in any part of this action of the Department, further explanation should be wished for, or any facts wanted, deemed important, and supposed to be in its possession, I hope the committee will apply for them, and they will be immediately transmitted, if within its reach.

"I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
"JOHN FORSYTH.

"HON. HENRY A. WISE,
Chairman Committee House of Reps. to inquire into the executive departments," &c.

In reply to a similar letter, the Postmaster General addressed the following answer:

"POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
February 3, 1837.

"SIR: Your letter of the 24th instant, enclosing sundry resolutions adopted by the committee of which you are chairman, has been received.

"The contingent appropriation of this Department is expended by an agent appointed by the Postmaster General. The moneys are placed to his credit in bank, by a warrant drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the requisition of the Postmaster General. All contingent bills are allowed by the Postmaster General; and all checks drawn for their payment have his approval written on their face, the bank being instructed to pay none others drawn by the agent on that fund. The contingent accounts of the Department have been settled down to the 1st January, 1837, and the accounts and vouchers are presumed to be on file in the Register's office, to which the committee is respectfully referred for the details which they ask. There is no other appropriation controlled by the Postmaster General, except the general one for the service of the Post Office Department; and no transfers have been made from the one to the other.

"These resolutions further require the heads of departments to communicate information to the committee in relation to acts and appointments which may have been done or made by them 'without authority of law.'

"If the words 'without authority of law' are to be construed as meaning in violation of law, the committee will perceive that the report of a single case by the heads of departments, under their own administration, would, ipso facto, be an admission that they had violated the laws; and the report of any case of an earlier date would be to make such a charge against their predecessors. It is presumed the committee did not mean to compel the heads of departments to become the accusers of themselves or their predecessors; and that the words 'without authority of law' must be construed as meaning merely cases not provided for in express terms, but authorized, or supposed to be authorized, by general provisions.

"In this sense no objection exists, in principle, to giving the most ample answers. But in this Department an answer cannot be given without a minute search through the books, and overhauling probably more than 30,000 accounts. Nearly the whole force of the Department and of the Auditor's office would have to be withdrawn from the current business, to the incalculable injury of the public service, and employed in searching out thousands of items which cannot be of the least practicable utility in promoting the objects of the committee, when obtained. I do not feel authorized, in the discharge of my duties to the public, to suffer the clerks furnished me for other purposes to be so employed.

"If, however, there be any specific case or cases in which abuse or corruption in the expenditures of this Department shall be charged, I shall consider it my duty, when informed thereof, to lay before the committee, as promptly as possible, all the information having reference to the case contained in its books and files. And if clerical force adequate to the object be furnished me by law, the specific application of every dollar of the funds of this Department will, in due time, be most cheerfully exhibited.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"AMOS KENDALL.

"Hon. HENRY A. WISE, Chairman, &c."

In like manner, the Secretary of the Treasury answered as follows:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 30, 1837.

"SIR: I had the honor, on the 28th instant, to receive your letter dated the 24th, and enclosing certain resolutions purporting to have passed 'in select committee of the House to inquire into the executive departments,' &c. A copy of them is annexed.

"In reply to the first resolution, I would observe that I am not aware of any money having been paid by this Department or its agents, within the period mentioned, to any printers or editors, without authority of law. All which has been paid is believed to be regularly reported and adjusted in the proper office; and the results, periodically communicated to Congress, are to be found in the printed documents. Nor do I know, under the inquiry contained in the second resolution, of any officer, agent, or deputy, appointed, employed, or paid, since the 4th of March, 1829, to the 1st of December last, without authority of law. If the committee intend to embrace, under this question, a list of all officers, agents, or deputies, not both nominated to the Senate and included in the Blue Book, though appointed under what is considered due authority of law, and wish an account of their respective duties, compensation, and the date of the origin of their authority, &c., since 1829, it would probably require all the spare force in this office for many months to comply with that wish in all its details, as it would embrace all the revenue officers in twenty to thirty cutters, all the agents to build light-houses, custom-houses, bridges, branch mints, &c., all subordinate custom-house officers, and too many others for recital. But appointments, payments, and vouchers, connected with all these, appear in the proper offices.

"In answer to the third resolution, I would observe that the yearly reports of expenditures made to Congress, including that presented at the commencement of the present session, on the subject of contingencies, contain, it is believed, all requested on this subject. None of these contingencies, so far as known to me, are supposed to have been not appropriated by law, or to have been charged from specific to other objects of expenditure, or to have been illegal or irregular.

"As to the fourth resolution, I do not recollect any cases of the description there given within the period mentioned. The cases of illness or temporary absences in public officers are not supposed to be embraced in the inquiry; and, perhaps, no such cases as those where temporary duties, of a different character, have been performed by some person in office. If it was intended to embrace either of these classes, I have no doubt such cases have occasionally happened, in the instances of clerks and others; and any particular one designated by the committee, on which any specific information may be desired by them, will be explained with pleasure.

"In respect to the conduct of any of my predecessors in office in this Department on any of these subjects, since the 3d of March, 1829, whether legal or illegal, my remarks must, of course, be deemed general, in stating an impression in their favor. In any special case which may be pointed out to me, I might be able to offer a detailed opinion, were it supposed to be proper by myself, and desirable by the committee; but which, from motives of delicacy, if not correct principles of law, is presumed not to be now wished. Whether such an opinion ought to be asked of me in relation to any of my own acts, under any of the resolutions, tending, as the reply must, either to exonerate or accuse myself, is so questionable under the constitution, that I should have declined answering it, unless from an impression that, in such an event, an inference not warrantable by the facts might, by some persons, have been drawn from my silence or refusal.

"Respectfully, yours,

"LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

"Hon. HENRY A. WISE,
Chairman of Executive Committee."

24th Cong. 2d Sess.]

Executive Administration.

So, also, the Secretary of the Navy replied as follows :

"NAVY DEPARTMENT, February 10, 1837.

"SIR : I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 24th ultimo, enclosing a copy of certain resolutions adopted by the above committee.

"These resolutions direct the heads of departments to furnish the committee with statements of acts implying official dereliction of duty on their part, or on the part of their predecessors in office, for different terms of years ; extending, in some cases, from the 4th of March, 1829, to the 1st December, 1836 ; and these statements to be made upon general allegations, without direct charges or specifications.

"The appointment of this committee to inquire into the condition of the executive departments, &c., does not, in my opinion, confer upon them power to direct the heads of those departments to make disclosures of the money paid by them without authority of law ; or of officers, agents, or deputies, appointed or employed by them without authority of law ; or of any other official acts by them without authority of law ; or to bear testimony as to like misdemeanors on the part of their predecessors in office, or others, upon such general suggestions as are contained in the resolutions.

"No such power is shown, and I do not feel justified, answering, as I do, for the Navy Department, to acknowledge such a power.

"Yet I have no hesitation in stating, in answer to the first resolution, that no sums of money have been paid by this Department, its agents or deputies, to printers or editors of newspapers, within the year ending on the 1st of December last, to my knowledge or belief, without authority of law.

"Should the committee think proper to designate and specify any case or cases in which they may think such illegal payments have been made, such case or cases, with the facts attending the same, will be communicated without delay.

"To the second resolution, I beg leave to state that no officers, agents, or deputies, have, to my knowledge or belief, been appointed, employed, or paid, by this Department, without authority of law, under the direction of my predecessors or myself, from the 4th of March, 1829, to 1st December last.

"In the various duties of this Department, it has been found necessary to appoint many agents. Many of the duties imposed by laws upon the heads of the departments must be performed by agents or deputies, the right of appointing whom is a necessary consequence of the obligation to perform the duty imposed. Such appointments are not considered as made without authority of law.

"To give the names of all agents and deputies thus appointed, from the 4th of March, 1829, to the 1st December last, with the sums paid to each, the services rendered by each, and for what reasons such appointments were made, would require more labor than could be performed by all the clerks in my office who could be spared for the purpose, without seriously interrupting the daily and necessary routine of business of my Department, for the residue of the session of Congress.

"A report will be immediately made upon any specified case or cases under this resolution.

"To the third resolution, I beg leave to state that the various amounts of money, to whom and for what paid, at this Department, within the last four years, ending on the 30th of September last, for contingencies, are contained in reports from this Department, printed among the documents of the House of Representatives, to wit :

"For the year 1833 : A report of the 13th of December of that year, document No. 14, 1st session, 23d Congress.

"For the year 1834 : A report of the 1st of January, 1835 ; document 52, 2d session, 23d Congress.

"For the year 1835 : A report of the 31st of December of that year, document No. 43, 1st session, 24th Congress.

"For 1836 : A report of the 31st of December of that year, document No. 60, of the present session.

"This last document brings down the account of the contingent expenses of this Department to the 30th of September last. It cannot be completed to the 1st of December last at this time, as will appear by a letter of the Fourth Auditor, hereto annexed.

"None of these payments have been made without appropriations.

"The letter of the Second Comptroller, hereto annexed, will show the transfers made since the 4th of March, 1829, from various naval appropriations. These have been made under the authority of the President of the United States, upon evidence that the public service required the same, and under the provisions of the 30th of June 1834, authorizing the same, except the last, which was made under the provisions of the act authorizing the South Sea exploring expedition.

"I am not aware that any illegal or irregular expenditures, allowances, or payments, of any description, have been made at this Department since the 4th of March, 1829.

"If any case or cases of payments or allowances, supposed to be illegal or irregular, shall be specified, a report will be immediately made upon the same.

"To the 4th resolution, I beg leave to state that I have no knowledge that any officers, agents, or deputies, of this Department, have, from the 4th of March, 1829, to the 1st of December last, received salaries, pay, or emoluments of any kind, without rendering service to the Government, or without being in office ; unless this inquiry extends to cases or temporary absence on leave, or to cases of absence from sickness, which it is not presumed to do ; and except what may be contained in a report of General Van Ness and Mr. Kendall, now in possession of the committee.

"I have no knowledge of any commissions to officers in this Department, within the same period, which have been antedated, or of officers who held other stations or appointments, State or Federal, when receiving pay for particular offices or agencies, or who have been engaged in private employment, whilst receiving pay from, and rendering no service to, the United States.

"To the fifth resolution, I have to state that I do not know that any innovations, not authorized by law, have been introduced or continued in this Department, within the period specified.

"I am, very respectfully, your obedient, humble servant,
"MAHLON DICKERSON.

"To the HON. HENRY A. WISE,
Chairman, &c."

On Tuesday, January 31, the committee adopted a resolution calling on the Postmaster General for information as to the removal of the late postmaster at Stanford, Kentucky. The next day this resolution was communicated to the Postmaster General, and on the 4th of February the following letter was received from him :

"POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,

February 3, 1837.

"SIR : I have received your note of the 1st instant, enclosing a resolution of the committee of which you are chairman, requesting me to furnish you with the following papers, viz :

"1. The papers relative to the removal of the late postmaster at Stanford, Kentucky.

"2. The papers and letters recommending the appointment of any person or persons other than the individual who was appointed, and who now holds the office.

"3. The papers and recommendations in favor of the appointment of the present postmaster, Alfred Hocker.

"In reply, I have the honor to state that the power of making appointments is vested by the constitution and laws in the President, heads of departments, and courts of law; checked, in relation to the higher appointments, by the Senate of the United States.

"No power whatever, in relation to them, except the power to impeach for corrupt or illegal appointments, is vested in the House of Representatives. Although there is nothing in this case (so far as I am personally concerned) I could wish to conceal, yet, believing it to be one of the duties of my station to regard the constitutional limitations of power, and that a compliance with the request of your committee would be a precedent tending to subvert them, I am compelled most respectfully to decline it.

"In justice to a persecuted fellow-citizen, I deem it proper to add, that Alfred Hocker's private character is believed to be without a blemish, and his qualifications undoubted; and that to hunt him through life for an error of opinion, in a particular case, as to his legal power, appears to me as unjust as it would be inhuman.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"AMOS KENDALL.

"Hon. HENRY A. WISE, Chairman, &c."

There are other letters, but these, it is presumed, will clearly show with what frankness and disposition to aid inquiry the President and heads of departments have responded to the committee. It is worthy of remark that the last letter quoted, from the head of the Post Office Department, takes the monstrous position that the House of Representatives is vested with no power to inquire into official misconduct respecting appointments to and removals from office. He not only refused to recognise that power by responding to the committee, but arrogated to himself the high prerogative of rebuking the committee, by casting upon it the unfounded imputation of "hunting, in an unjust and inhuman manner, a fellow-citizen through life, for an error of opinion"—that "fellow-citizen" a favorite of his, the notorious Alfred Hocker, who was sheriff of Kentucky, and, in violation of his oath of office, had withheld the poll of Lincoln county, in that State, in the celebrated contested election between Moore and Letcher, and who had been rewarded, as was supposed, by an appointment given him by the Postmaster General, at Stanford, in consideration of an infamous act of knavery for "the party," since made felony by an act of the State, passed in consequence of his very conduct in that case!

The undersigned regrets to add that the majority of the committee, also, showed as little disposition to pursue inquiry, and showed every disposition to sustain the President and the departments in their positions, and in their course of obstructing fair and full investigation.

The journal will justify, in almost every instance, this serious charge against the majority.

On January 27th, when the letter of the President of the 26th was read, Mr. Campbell, of the committee, submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the chairman of this committee be directed to ask leave of the House to be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the 17th of January, 1837, which was referred to this committee, the short period remaining of the session making it difficult, under any circumstances, to do even partial justice to the subject referred to them; and as the views which the President has expressed in his communication of this morning, and the instructions he promises to give to the heads of the different departments, will bar all investigation, and render the best-directed efforts of this committee to effect the objects of its organization futile and useless.

"Which resolution, on motion of Mr. Lincoln, was modified by adding, with the consent of the mover, the following:

"And that, in making the motion for the discharge of the committee, the chairman report to the House a copy of the journal of its proceedings.

"AYES—Mr. Wise, Mr. Lincoln, and Mr. Campbell—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, and Mr. Mann—5."

This resolution was rejected, but reconsidered and laid upon the table.

"Mr. Hannegan moved to reconsider the vote rejecting the resolution of Mr. Campbell, asking leave for the committee to be discharged; which motion was sustained, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Wise, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Campbell, and Mr. Lincoln—5.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Mann—3.

"Mr. Hannegan moved that the resolution of Mr. Campbell do lie upon the table; which motion was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann—5.

"NAYS—Mr. Wise, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln—3."

On Monday, January 30, Mr. Wise submitted the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the letter of the President of the United States, dated the 26th instant, addressed to the chairman of this committee, and handed to him by the private secretary of the President, in presence of the committee, is an official attack of the Executive upon the proceedings of the House of Representatives and of this committee, and upon the privileges of members of both Houses of Congress; and opposes unlawful and unconstitutional resistance to the just powers of the House of Representatives and of this committee: therefore,

"Resolved, That the chairman of this committee be directed to report to the House his letter, and the resolutions of this committee enclosed, addressed to the President, and the letter of the President in reply thereto, dated the 26th instant; and to submit to the consideration of the House the propriety and necessity of adopting measures to defend its proceedings; to protect the privileges of its members; and to enforce its just powers, and those of its committees; to enable this committee to discharge the duties devolved upon it by the resolution of the 17th instant, adopted by the House of Representatives."

This having been laid on the table also, on Tuesday, January 31, Mr. Wise submitted the following resolution:

"Whereas the second resolution, heretofore adopted by this committee, calling for information from the President of the United States and the heads of the several executive departments, as amended, by inserting the words 'if any, without authority of law,' did call upon the President and the heads of departments to furnish evidence against themselves of their having appointed, employed, and paid officers, or agents, or deputies, 'without authority of law:' Now, therefore, with a view to call for information simply of their official actings and doings as public officers, as shown by the public records, so that this committee may report the same to the House of Representatives, and that it may judge for itself whether said officers have acted without authority of law, without calling upon them to give testimony, or to judge themselves in their own cases: be it

"Resolved, That the President of the United States, and the heads of the several executive departments, be requested to furnish this committee with the evidence on files of the executive departments, respectively, of the appointment, employment, and payment, of all officers, agents, deputies, or commissioners, who have been appointed, or employed and paid, since the 4th day of March, 1829, to the 1st December last, by the President or either of said heads of departments, respectively, without nomination to and the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States: showing the names of such officers, agents, deputies, or commissioners; the sums paid to each; the services rendered by each, and by what authority appointed and paid.

"Mr. Mann moved to lay the foregoing preamble and resolution on the table; and, on the question being taken, the votes were—

"AYES—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—5.

"NAYS—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3."

This also having been laid on the table, the next day, February 1st, Mr. Wise moved to take up his resolution relating to the letter of the President to this committee, which resolution was laid on the table on the Monday previous, and the motion was agreed to.

"Mr. Campbell moved to amend said resolution as follows: Strike out all after the word 'Resolved,' where it first occurs, and before 'therefore,' and insert: 'That the answer of the President, of the 26th of January, is not a compliance with the request of the committee, but a refusal to furnish the information requested in the resolutions communicated to him: and, therefore:' so that it would read as follows:

"Resolved, That the answer of the President, of the 26th of January, is not a compliance with the request of the committee, but a refusal to furnish the information requested in the resolutions communicated to him; and, therefore,

"Resolved, That the chairman of this committee be directed to report to the House his letter, and the resolutions of this committee enclosed, addressed to the President, and the letter of the President in reply thereto, dated the 26th instant; and to submit to the consideration of the House the propriety and necessity of adopting measures to defend its proceedings; to protect the privileges of its members; and to enforce its just powers, and those of its committees; to enable this committee to discharge the duties devolved upon it by the resolution of the 17th instant, adopted by the House of Representatives.

"And the question being on said amendment, it was adopted, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Campbell, Hannegan, Lincoln, Chaney, Wise—5.

"NAYS—Messrs. Pearce, Muhlenberg, Parks, Mann—4.

"Mr. Lincoln moved to amend the resolution, as amended, by inserting before the word 'therefore' the following:

"Resolved, That the letter of the President, in reply to the resolutions of this committee, is reproachful to the House in the adoption of the resolution of the 17th of January last; disrespectful to the committee acting under its authority; and an attack upon the privileges of members, by connecting their speeches on the floor of the House with the action of the House itself; and proposing that they should be examined as witnesses, touching matters referred to by them in debate.

"Which motion was lost, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Campbell, Lincoln, Wise—3.

"NAYS—Messrs. Pearce, Muhlenberg, Hannegan, Parks, Mann, Chaney—6.

"The question recurring on the resolution, as amended, the same was rejected, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Campbell, Lincoln, Wise—3.

"NAYS—Messrs. Pearce, Muhlenberg, Hannegan, Parks, Mann, Chaney—6."

Thus, in every form in which the question could be presented, did the committee refuse to act upon the letter of the President.

The journal of the committee shows, almost passive, the course of delay pursued by the majority in laying resolutions of inquiry upon the table, and their actual rejection of many resolutions involving subjects of the greatest importance and the most serious charges against the executive departments. (See pages 11, 12, 13, 14, 24, 42, 78, 108, 109, 126, 189, of the printed journal of the committee.) There it will be seen that resolutions, about adopting which it was to have been expected there could be no hesitation, were almost invariably laid on the table before they were passed; these, as they were finally passed and acted on, it is not necessary particularly to refer to. But there were a number of a similar character as to their necessity and propriety, some of which were refused to be taken up at all, and others positively rejected. To show their character, they have only to be specified.

On the 24th of January, Mr. Wise submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish this committee with all correspondence, letters, or papers, on the files of the War Department, or in his possession officially, respecting or relating to the war in Florida with the Seminole Indians; and, also, respecting or relating to the raising and paying volunteers for the protection of the Southwestern frontier, under General Gaines."

This was laid upon the table until February 3d, when Mr. Wise moved to take it up. The motion was rejected by the following vote:

"AYES—Messrs. Hannegan, Campbell, Lincoln, Wise—4.

"NAYS—Messrs. Pearce, Muhlenberg, Parks, Mann—4."

Thus a subject which had caused two courts of inquiry to be ordered by the President himself—which had called two major generals of the army from their posts, for their conduct to be subjected to severe scrutiny—before one of which courts a gallant officer, General Duncan Clinch, who had borne himself like a patriot soldier in the campaign, and who had, as all admit, done his duty in the war, had in substance declared, on oath, that the failure of the campaigns against the Creek and Seminole Indians was to be attributed, not to those generals, but to the neglect of the War Department. This subject of inquiry, we repeat, was refused to be taken up by the majority.

Again: The majority having perverted the first of the four resolutions sent to the President and heads of departments, by inserting therein the words "without authority of law," with a view to obtain a direct vote of the committee upon the subject of executive patronage to the public press, Mr. Wise, on the 24th January, offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the heads of the several departments be directed to furnish this committee with a statement showing the amount of patronage per annum in the executive departments, respectively, to the press of the country, taking the year ending the 30th September, 1836; showing the sums of money paid within that year by such departments, respectively, their agents or deputies, to printers or editors of newspapers; specifying the names and places of the publication of the newspapers owned or published by them, and showing the services and considerations for which such sums have been paid; giving each item as stated in the accounts of such printer or editor."

This resolution was laid on the table, upon the express ground that the departments were not accountable for the use or the abuse of their patronage to the press, provided that they kept within the letter of the law.

Again: On the 25th of January, Mr. Campbell submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That any member having cause for believing that abuses exist, or have existed, since the 4th of March, 1829, in any department of the Government; that fraud or peculation is, or has been, practised by any of the agents of the Government, since the 4th of March, 1829; and shall, upon such cause or belief, make a motion, or move a resolution of inquiry, this committee will adopt the motion or the resolution of inquiry; the responsibility of instituting the inquiry resting on the mover of the resolution or motion.

"Mr. Pearce moved to amend the foregoing resolution by striking out the words 'the responsibility of instituting the inquiry resting on the mover of the resolution or motion;' which motion was negatived, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Parks, Mr. Chaney—4.

"NAYS—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Mann, Mr. Wise—5.

"Mr. Muhlenberg moved to insert between the words 'that' and 'abuses,' in the foregoing resolution, the word 'particular,' so as to read 'particular abuses;' which motion was negatived, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Parks, Mr. Chaney—4.

"NAYS—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Mann, Mr. Wise, Mr. Hannegan—5.

"Mr. Pearce moved to lay the said resolution on the table; which was affirmed, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—6.

"NAYS—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3."

Again: On the 28th of January, Mr. Campbell offered the following resolution, which necessarily grew out of discussions before the committee:

"Resolved, That in future, whenever a member of this committee, upon his own knowledge, or upon information derived from others, shall give information of any specific charge of abuse or corruption in any executive department of the Government, and name a witness or witnesses to substantiate such charge or charges, this committee will forthwith proceed to the investigation of such charge or charges, and to the examination of such witness or witnesses as may be named by the member giving information of such charge of abuse or corruption.

"On motion of Mr. Mann, the foregoing resolution was laid upon the table, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann—5.

"NAYS—Mr. Wise, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln—3."

Thus the committee, by its proceedings, expressly refused to declare either that it would act upon motions or resolutions of inquiry, or that it would proceed to investigate specific charges, even of abuse or corruption in any executive department of the Government, or examine witnesses touching them.

On the 1st of February, Mr. Muhlenberg offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That, before any witness or witnesses be sworn, the member at whose instance he or they were called shall state, in writing, the purpose for which he or they were severally called as witnesses, the matters to which he or they are expected to testify, and the charges which he or they are expected by the member to sustain against the executive departments, or either of them, or against any officer or officers, agent or agents, or either of them, by fact within his or her personal knowledge.

"Which was adopted, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Campbell—6.

"NAYS—Mr. Mann, Mr. Wise—2.

"Mr. Wise submitted the following:

"Mr. Wise, in compliance with the conditions of the resolution of this committee, of this day, requiring the member at whose instance a witness is called to state the reasons of calling upon him to testify, assigns the following reasons:

"1st. The purpose for which he (the member) has called upon the witnesses summoned and requested to attend at his instance is, that said witnesses may be sworn to testify, and the truth to say, touching the inquiries of this committee directed by the resolution of the House.

"2. The matters to which they are expected to testify are matters within their knowledge, severally, concerning the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, and concerning all matters embraced in said resolution of the House of Representatives.

"3d. The charges against the executive departments, and their officers or agents, which they are expected by the member to sustain, are charges of violation of duty; of corrupt violation of duty, in abusing legal authority, in corrupting and subsidizing the public press; in removing faithful officers for opinion's sake; in retaining corrupt and fraudulent officers in place, knowing of their malfeasance and malversation in office; in appointing and paying agents of various descriptions; in making unjust and exorbitant allowance for services to political favorites; in paying a Treasury warrant which was gambled away by a disbursing officer; in allowing an account which had virtually been disallowed, and then paying it, after its allowance had been forged, without causing the offender to be prosecuted; in allowing Government officers to organize political societies to influence elections; in speculating on the offices of the Government and on the public property; in interfering with the proceedings of Congress in an improper manner; and concerning various other matters upon which charges of equal weight may be founded, if they are ascertained by the evidence.

"And the question being whether the foregoing reasons, as assigned by the chairman, are a compliance with the conditions of the resolution, it was carried in the affirmative, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Mann, Mr. Wise—7.

"NAY—Mr. Parks—1."

On the 14th of February, Mr. Pearce offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this committee, in discharging their duties under the resolution of the House of Representatives of January 17, will not, in the absence of definite, specified charges of corruption and abuses, inquire into the reasons of the Executive, or the heads of the executive departments, for appointments to or removals from office.

"Mr. Wise moved an amendment, as follows:

"Resolved, That whenever definite and specific charges are made that the President of the United States, or either of the heads of departments, have removed efficient and faithful officers without just cause of complaint, and appointed others in their places, for opinion's sake, or on account of party services, this committee will inquire into such definite and specific charges, to ascertain how far the President or heads of departments have abused their authority to appoint and remove officers; and to what extent such appointments and removals have tended to restrain and trammel the freedom of opinion; to affect the freedom and purity of elections in this country; to punish individuals for the exercise of that freedom; and to corrupt and enslave public officers who hold, and private individuals who seek, places under this Government.

"The question being taken on Mr. Wise's amendment, it was rejected, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Campbell, Lincoln, Wise—3.

"NAYS—Messrs. Pearce, Muhlenberg, Parks, Mann, Chaney—5.

"The question recurring on the adoption of the resolution offered by Mr. Pearce, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

24th Cong. 2d Sess.]

Executive Administration.

"AYES—Messrs. Pearce, Muhlenberg, Parks, Mann, Chaney—5.

"NAYS—Messrs. Campbell, Lincoln, Wise—3."

On the 16th of February, Mr. Wise offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this committee will inquire whether the executive officers, or either of them, have established, or assisted in establishing, presses or newspapers, for party purposes, and given pledges to the proprietors thereof of the Government patronage, and have performed those pledges by giving such presses or papers the patronage of the Government; and whether the public printing has been taken from long-established presses or papers, with numerous subscribers, and given to such presses and papers newly established, with pledges of the Government patronage, without subscribers.

"Which resolution was rejected, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Campbell, Wise—2.

"NAYS—Messrs. Pearce, Muhlenberg, Mann—3."

On the 4th of February, Mr. Wise offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish this committee with the originals or copies of all letters, papers, reports, or correspondence, on the files of the Treasury Department, or in his possession, in relation to the official acts of himself, or of the collector at Newport, Rhode Island, in removing David Melvill from the office of weigher and gauger at that place.

"Mr. Mann offered the following amendment: Add at the end of the resolution, 'except such as have heretofore been communicated to the Senate of the United States; and except such, also, as are of a confidential character.'

"Which amendment was rejected, as follows:

"AY—Mr. Mann—1.

"NAYS—Messrs. Muhlenberg, Campbell, Parks, Lincoln, Chaney, Wise—6.

"The question recurring on the adoption of the resolution, the same was rejected, as follows:

"AYES—Messrs. Campbell, Lincoln, Wise—3.

"NAYS—Messrs. Muhlenberg, Parks, Mann, Chaney—4."

Thus it clearly appears, by these proceedings, that the committee efficiently seconded the views of the President and heads of departments, and practically carried them out. 1st. The member of the committee, at whose instance a witness was called, was required to state in writing the charges witness was expected to sustain. 2d. The committee positively determined that it would not, in the absence of definite, specified charges of corruption and abuses, inquire into the reasons of the Executive, or heads of executive departments, for appointments to or removals from office, in direct contradiction to the decision of the House, which rejected the amendment requiring specific charges. 3d. It decided that when DEFINITE and specific charges were made of CORRUPTION and abuses in appointments to and removals from office, and in subsidizing the public press, it would not inquire into them; and 4th. When such specific charges were made, as they were in the cases of appointing Alfred Hocker to and removing David Melvill from office, and as in establishing newspapers with the public money, the committee refused to inquire into them, and to examine witnesses in relation to them.

Such will clearly illustrate the principles upon which the committee proceeded in instituting inquiries into the condition of the various executive departments by RESOLUTIONS.

The questions which the majority refused to propound to witnesses, when called, will show that they went even still further in shielding the executive departments and officers from full and fair investigation.

Notwithstanding the principles of the majority, as illustrated by the foregoing resolutions and votes, as to SPE-CIFIC and definite investigation, the very first question propounded by them in committee was so vague and indefinite, so intangible and abstract, that one of the most intelligent and respectable witnesses first called, the Hon. James Parker, of New Jersey, who did know of a specific act of the worst corruption and abuse in one or the other, or both the President and Secretary of the Treasury, could not answer it on account of its general form.

"First question by Mr. Mann to Mr. Parker:

"Do you, of your own knowledge, know of any act, by either of the heads of the executive departments, which is either corrupt or a violation of their official duties?"

"Mr. Parker presented the following objections to answering:

"I do not understand this question sufficiently to enable me to answer it in this general form. I came here by order of the committee, neither as accuser nor to accuse; and I consider myself bound to answer questions on those points only to which my attention is directed by the committee.

"Mr. Pearce moved that the objection of Mr. Parker to answering the question be overruled, and that he be required to answer the same.

"Mr. Mann, upon the suggestion of Mr. Wise, withdrew his question, to enable Mr. Wise to examine Mr. Parker as to the specific acts; and Mr. Pearce accordingly withdrew his motion."

But that question was repeatedly put to other witnesses, with the obnoxious view of proving NEGATIVELY a general good character of the administration, or of making certain witnesses purge themselves of certain charges against that character. Not only was this general question propounded, but when Messrs. White, Peyton, and Pickens, were called, Mr. Mann stated the reasons in writing for calling them—his specifications of reasons were:

"1. That the purpose for which he has desired the honorable witnesses named in the said resolution to be sworn is, to prosecute the inquiries directed by the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 17th of January instant.

"2. The matters to which they are expected to testify are, facts, if any they know, respectively, of their own knowledge, which will show a wilful violation of the duties of the heads of the respective executive departments of the Government of the United States, or the subordinate officers connected with such departments, or either of them.

"3. The 'charges against the executive departments,' which it is expected they will sustain by facts within their own knowledge, are corrupt violations of official duties.

"The question being stated, whether, in the foregoing specifications, Mr. Mann has complied with the requisition of the resolution calling for the same, and whether the witnesses present shall be sworn, those who voted in the affirmative were:

"AYES—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—3.

"Those who voted in the negative were:

"NAYS—Mr. Wise, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Parks, Mr. Lincoln—5.

"So it was decided that said specification does not comply with the requisition of the resolution.

"The honorable Francis W. Pickens, a member of the House, summoned as a witness, read to the committee a paper, which he denominated a protest against his being examined as a witness; and which, when he should be called upon to be sworn, he said he would submit to be placed upon their files.

"Mr. Mann submitted, in compliance with the requisition of the last meeting, for specifications as to the grounds of summoning the witnesses in attendance, the following, viz:

"Second specifications by Mr. Mann.

"Mr. Mann, in compliance with the conditions of the resolutions of this committee of the 28th instant, states, in writing, again:

"1. That the specific purposes for which he has desired the honorable witnesses named in the said resolution to be summoned are, to prosecute the inquiries specified and directed by the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 17th January instant.

"2d. The matters to which they are expected to testify are, facts within their own knowledge, if any, they know, severally, of their own knowledge, concerning the condition of the various executive departments; the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted; the manner in which the public business has been conducted in all of them; the failure of such departments to accomplish the objects of their creation; the violation of the official duties of the said departments, respectively.

"3. The charges against the executive departments, which it is expected they will sustain by facts within their own knowledge, are charges of corrupt violations of official duties, abuses in the administration of the public affairs, with which such departments are charged by law and the constitution.

"And the question being, 'Is the assignment of reasons for summoning said witnesses sufficient, and in compliance with the resolutions of the committee?' it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney, and Mr. Wise—5.

"NAYS—Mr. Muhlenberg and Mr. Parks—2."

Such is a specimen of the specific examination of a member of the Senate and members of the House, who had been called at the request of the President to purge themselves of all contempt to his administration!

When another class of witnesses was called, some from the departments, others from a great distance, to testify of acts of corruption and abuse, as notorious in this metropolis as the noon-tide sun, acts named and specified before the committee until reiteration became tiresome, the majority became more strict and contracted in the investigation.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Buck:

"14. Do you know the amount of patronage of the War Department to the press, and the principle upon which printers are selected to do the public printing; whether they are selected on account of their political opinions?

"This question was objected to by Mr. Parks; and on the question being put, Shall the question be propounded? it was decided in the negative, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Mann, Mr. Parks, Mr. Chaney—6.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Buck:

"15. Do you know, or are you informed, whether any of the heads of departments, or any officer or agent thereof, has been, or is now, interested in Indian reservations?

"Answer by Mr. Buck: I do not know, neither have I been informed, that any one of the heads of departments is now, or ever has been, interested in Indian reservations; neither do I know that any officer or agent of either department has ever been, or is now, so interested.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Buck:

"16. Do you know, or are you informed, whether any of the heads of the executive departments, or any officer or agent thereof, has been interested in the purchase of public lands?

"This question was objected to by Mr. Parks; and the question being put, Shall the interrogatory be propounded? it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Wise, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Hannegan—5.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Parks, Mr. Chaney, Mr. Mann—4.

"Answer to question 16 by Mr. Buck: I have no knowledge of the facts mentioned in the above interrogatory; neither have I any information in relation to the same, except such as is derived from the newspapers of the day.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Buck:

"Do you know upon what principle public officers are appointed to and removed from office, in the several executive departments; whether appointments or removals are not made in regard to the political opinions of officers?

"This question was objected to by Mr. Pearce; and on the question being taken, Shall the interrogatory be propounded? it was decided in the negative, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—6.

"W. J. Duane (late Secretary of the Treasury) appeared as a witness.

"Mr. Wise submitted the following question, to be propounded to said witness, viz:

"1. Will you please to state all that you know respecting the conduct of the President of the United States in removing the public money from the Bank of the United States, in the year 1833?

"The question being objected to by Mr. Mann, and the question stated, Shall said interrogatory be propounded? it was decided in the negative, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—4.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann—4.

"Mr. Wise then submitted the following question, to be propounded to the witness, viz:

"2. Do you know whether the President consulted or advised with Reuben M. Whitney or Amos Kendall as to that measure, and what influence those persons had upon the President in taking that step?

"Objected to by Mr. Mann; and the question being stated, Shall said interrogatory be propounded? it was decided in the negative, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann—5.

"Mr. Wise also submitted the following, to be propounded to the witness:

"3. Have you reason to believe that your official relations to the Government were disturbed by the active interference of said Whitney and Kendall, or either of them, with the opinions of the President in relation to that measure?

"Objected to by Mr. Mann; and the question being stated, Shall said interrogatory be propounded? it was decided in the negative, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Muhlenberg—5.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Woodbury:

"2. Will you please furnish this committee with a copy or copies of the papers in the Treasury Department or in your possession, particularly the report of Mr. Littlefield, the collector, in relation to the removal of David Melvill from the office of weigher and gauger at Newport, Rhode Island?

"Objected to by Mr. Mann; and on the question being stated, Shall said interrogatory be propounded? it was decided in the negative, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—4.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Mann, Mr. Parks, Mr. Chaney—5.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Woodbury:

"3. Please state all that you know in relation to the removal of David Melvill from the office of weigher and gauger at Newport, Rhode Island, and the reasons for said removal.

"Objected to by Mr. Mann; and the question being stated, Shall the interrogatory be propounded? it was decided in the negative, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—6.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Woodbury:

"5. Are the papers which you did not communicate to the Senate, because they are confidential, on the files of the Treasury Department; and was the report of the collector, Littlefield, included in the number of papers considered confidential?

"Objected to by Mr. Mann; and on the question, Shall said interrogatory be propounded? it was decided in the negative, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney, Mr. Muhlenberg—5.

"Mr. Wise proposed the following question, to be propounded to the Hon. Aaron Vanderpoel, of the House, a witness present, viz:

"1. Did you inform any member or members of the House of Representatives that the President desired or preferred that the resolution which was adopted on the 17th of January, under which this committee is appointed, should be passed; and if so, by what authority did you give such information?

"Objected to by Mr. Parks; and on the question being stated, Shall said interrogatory be propounded? it was decided in the negative, as follows:

"AY—Mr. Wise—1.

"NAYS—Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—7.

"Mr. Wise proposed the following question, to be propounded to Mr. Vanderpoel, viz:

"2. Did the President of the United States inform you, or intimate to you, or to any one else in your knowledge, that he desired that the resolution of the 17th of January, under which this committee was appointed, should be passed by the House?

"Objected to by Mr. Mann; and on the question being stated, Shall said interrogatory be propounded? it was decided in the negative, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Wise—2.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—7.

"Honorable James Standefer, of the House of Representatives, being present, Mr. Wise proposed the following question:

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Standefer:

"1. Please state all that you know respecting a letter that was written, some time during the year 1834, to Benjamin F. Curry, then acting as agent of the Government, in treating with the Cherokee Indians, by the President of the United States, respecting yourself; whether said letter was not used publicly, by said Curry, against your election to Congress; and whether he was not influenced by the President in electioneering against you as a candidate. And state the purport of said letter, as exhibited to you and to crowds in your district.

"Objected to by Mr. Parks, and rejected by the following vote:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Wise—2.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Parks, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—5.

"Question by Mr. Lincoln to Mr. Standefer:

"2. Did Benjamin F. Curry, an Indian agent, in the last congressional canvass in your district, publicly exhibit a letter which he represented to be addressed to him by the President of the United States, to prejudice your claims to favorable consideration as a candidate in the election?

"Objected to by Mr. Mann, and rejected, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—2.

"NAYS—Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—3.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Towns:

"2. Do you know, of your own knowledge, or from any of the officers or agents of the executive branch of this Government, whether they, or either of them, are now, or have been, interested personally in purchasing or speculating in the reservations of Creek or other Indians; and, if either of them, who?

"Objected to by Mr. Mann, and rejected by the following vote:

"AY—Mr. Wise—1.

"NAYS—Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—4.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Towns:

"3. Do you know, or have you been informed by him, whether the Hon. John Forsyth, Secretary of State, is now, or has been, personally interested in purchasing or speculating in the reservations of the Creek or other Indians?

"Objected to by Mr. Mann, and rejected by the following vote:

—Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Wise—2.

"NAYS—Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—3.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Towns:

"4. Do you know, of your own knowledge, or from information derived from either of them, whether John J. Abert, whilst agent of the Government to locate the reservations under the treaty of 1832, with the Creek Indians, was personally interested and engaged in purchasing and speculating in said reservations; and, if so, whether John Forsyth, Secretary of State, was interested, in like manner, with said Abert or others?

"Objected to by Mr. Mann, and rejected by the following vote, the committee being equally divided:

"AYES—Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—3.

"Question by Mr. Mann to Mr. Towns:

"5. Do you know, of your own knowledge, or by information derived from him, whether J. J. Abert, whilst agent of the Government to locate the reservations under the treaty of 1832, with the Creek Indians, was personally interested and engaged in purchasing such reservations?

"Answer by Mr. Towns:

"I do not know, of my own knowledge, or from information derived from J. J. Abert, or any other source, that he was personally interested and engaged in purchasing Indian reservations under the treaty of 1832, with the Creek Indians.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Lewis:

"4. Was there not a contract entered into by J. & L. Joseph & Co., of New York, and R. J. Phillips, of Philadelphia, on the one part, and William D. Lewis and others, on the other part, early in the month of November, 1835, or about that time, to operate in the purchase of stock in the Morris Canal and Banking Company, the latter parties agreeing to furnish funds to a large amount; and were not the funds drawn from the Girard Bank, and furnished monthly from November to April succeeding, inclusive; and was not the account closed in June, 1836, by paying over to you (William D. Lewis and others) your share of the profit? If so, how many thousand dollars; and was not Reuben M. Whitney, agent of the Girard Bank to transact its business with the Treasury Department, concerned with you and others in said speculation and profits?

"Objected to by Mr. Pearce, and rejected by the following vote:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—6.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Lewis:

"5. Had you not a correspondence with Reuben M. Whitney, in the autumn of 1835, in relation to a speculation in Morris Canal and Banking Company stock, and with reference to his procuring a portion of the public revenue to be placed in said bank for the purpose of enhancing the value of its stock, to favor your profits and his; and did not Mr. Whitney give you reason to believe that he could so procure a portion of the public revenue for the purpose aforesaid?

"Objected to by Mr. Mann, and rejected by the following vote:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Hannegan—4.

"No other question was propounded.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Hobbie:

"Do you know, of your knowledge, or from the information derived from them, whether any officers or agents of the Treasury Department, or of any other executive department, since the 4th of March, 1829, have been interested or concerned in purchasing or speculating in the public lands? If so, state all that you know or are informed of by the officers or agents themselves, as to their purchases and speculations aforesaid.

"Objected to by Mr. Hannegan, and rejected by the following vote:

"AYES—Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—4.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—5.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Hobbie:

"6. Please state all that you know respecting the removal of B. H. Wheeler from the office of postmaster at Providence, Rhode Island.

"AYES—Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—5.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Hobbie:

"7. Do you know whether a postmaster in one of the New England States did, or did not, write to the Post Office Department that he wished to remove some distance, say twenty or thirty miles, from his office, but wished to retain his office as postmaster, saying he would have the duties of the office discharged by a clerk, and that he could still assist to re-elect General Jackson; and did you yourself not write a letter in reply, that he was at liberty to do as he requested, and encouraging him to do all he could to electioneer for General Jackson?

"Objected to by Mr. Mann, and rejected, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise, Mr. Campbell—4.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—4.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Forsyth:

"3. Did you, or not, exert your influence, personal or official, with any Senator, or other person, to have the treaty ratified with said stipulation as to the Golphin claim; or with any person, an officer or agent, or not, of the Government, to have said stipulation inserted in said treaty?

"Objected to by Mr. Parks, and rejected by the following vote:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Chaney, Mr. Wise—4.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann—4.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Forsyth:

"4. Did you not, whilst Governor of the State of Georgia, recommend the Golphin claim to the favorable consideration of the Georgia Legislature?

"Objected to by Mr. Parks, and rejected by the following vote:

"AYES—Mr. Wise.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Parks, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—7.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Forsyth:

"6. Have you, or not, been directly or indirectly interested or concerned in the purchase of, and in speculating in, the reservations of Creek or other Indians, since you have been in the office of Secretary of State?

"Objected to by Mr. Mann, and rejected by the following vote:

"AYES—Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—5.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Pearce:

"Will you please state all that you know respecting the causes, reasons, and influences, which were brought to bear or operated on the collector, Mr. Littlefield, at Newport, Rhode Island, or upon the Secretary of the Treasury, in removing David Melvill, a weigher and gauger under said collector, from the said office of weigher and gauger?

"Objected to by Mr. Parks, and rejected, as follows, Mr. Pearce being excused from voting:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—4.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Kendall:

"2. Do you know whether the President of the United States did or did not communicate to you and to Reuben M. Whitney his intention to remove the deposites before he advised with the Secretary of the Treasury; and whether he did not approve of R. M. Whitney as contemplated agent of the deposit banks to be selected before their selection?

"Objected to by Mr. Mann, and rejected, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Wise—2.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—5.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Kendall:

"4. Please state to this committee all you know respecting the formation of a club called the Hickory Club, composed of officers of the Government in this city; state its organization, its design, and its means of operation; whether its members were officers and agents of the executive departments; by whom it was organized; whether its design was to influence the elections of the people; and whether its means were derived, or not, in part, from the salaries of executive officers.

"Objected to by Mr. Parks, and rejected, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Wise—2.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—7.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Kendall:

"Do you know whether any officers or agents of the executive departments have ever formed political combinations to control the elections of the people, and to influence the public press?

"Objected to by Mr. Mann, and adopted, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—5.

"NAYS—Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—4.

"Answer by Mr. Kendall:

"I have no knowledge of any combinations of public officers for the objects stated in the question, nor of any combinations of which public officers formed a part, for any other purpose than to promote objects of a general character, by discussion of principles, without regard to men.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Kendall:

"6. Will you please to state what combinations you know of to promote objects of a general character, of which public officers formed a part; the character of those combinations; whether they were political or not; whether favorable or not to this administration, and to the election of Martin Van Buren to the presidency; and whether they aimed to procure the Government patronage for their objects?

"Objected to by Mr. Parks, and rejected, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—5.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Kendall:

"8. Will you please look upon the paper handed you, and state what you know respecting the facts therein spoken of?

"The paper alluded to is in the following words, viz:

"Story of the Indian reservations.

"Some years ago, certain tracts of land, situated, principally or wholly, in the State of Mississippi, were reserved by Congress (or by Indian treaty, to which Congress assented) for the use of the Indians, and to be disposed of by them, and for their benefit, whenever the President of the United States should give his assent to such sale and transfer, (not otherwise.) These lands were known to be very valuable, and the poor Indians could be easily enough managed; perhaps they had or were about to leave the east for the west side of the Mississippi river; but how to obtain the assent of the President to so large a sale of Indian lands to a company of speculators seemed a more difficult matter. A company was formed in Boston two or three years ago, with, it is believed, a capital of $300,000, to try to effect this object. Amos Binney, Esq., was a leading man in the company; and it is believed that Brodhead, navy agent in Boston, was another; and various other individuals had a greater or less interest in it; but what did, as is believed, obtain the President's assent to the sale and transfer, was the admission of Amos Kendall, at present Postmaster General, into the concern; he to have one third part of the profits of the speculation when it shall be closed up, without, in fact, paying one dollar of the consideration, although he may appear to have paid his part as well as all the others. Yet the agreement of the other partners with Mr. Kendall was, that they would furnish the money to pay his one third part of the consideration, free from interest, provided he (Kendall) would obtain the assent of the President to the sale, and would, when requested so to do by the other partners, go to the lands and transact such matters and things relating to their common interest as the company might deem expedient. The lands were purchased by the company; therefore, we are to infer that Mr. Kendall did obtain the President's assent to the sale; but Mr. Kendall was not, and probably will not be, called on for any further services. Those interested in the purchase speak confidently of their expectation of realizing, at the end of the sales, three or four dollars for every one invested. The people of the United States, by this transaction, have not been defrauded or overreached; but the interest of the Indians in these reservations has probably been obtained by this company for less than half its market value. How far the President should guard the interest of the Indians is for him and Congress to determine; possibly it may have some connexion with his oath of office. But if the interests of the Indians must or may be sacrificed, shall it be done for the benefit of a few favorites, and at the sole suggestion of one individual, himself more deeply interested than any other? February 9, 1837."

"Objected to by Mr. Mann, and rejected, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Pearce, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—6.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Kendall:

"Have you, or not, since you have been Fourth Auditor and Postmaster General, or since you have been an executive officer of this Government, been editor, proprietor, or part owner, or publisher, joint or sole, of a newspaper called the Globe, or other newspaper published in this District, or in the United States? If so, state whether you have or have not written editorial articles for the same; and whether you have had or exercised a control or not over its general course in politics.

"Objected to by Mr. Hannegan, and rejected, as follows:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—5.

"No further questions were propounded to the witness.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Littlefield:

"1. Please state to this committee all that you know respecting the conduct of David Melvill, whilst in the office of weigher and gauger, at Newport, Rhode Island, and respecting his removal from that office, and the action of the Secretary of the Treasury thereon.

"Objected to by Mr. Pearce, and rejected by the following vote:

"AYES—Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Wise—2.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann—3.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Henshaw:

"1. Is Amos Kendall now, or has he been since he has been an executive officer, a member of any company for the purchase of the public lands? If so, state what company, and the extent of his interest.

"Objected to by Mr. Mann, and rejected:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—3.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Henshaw:

"2. Did the said Amos Kendall apply to become a member of said company, or was he applied to by said company, or any of its members, to become a member?

"Objected to by Mr. Pearce, and rejected:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—3.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Henshaw:

"3. Did the said Amos Kendall make any advance to the capital stock of said company? And, if so, in what manner was the sum procured and advanced?

"Objected to by Mr. Mann, and rejected:

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—3.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Henshaw:

"4. What advantage or benefit was contemplated from the said Amos Kendall becoming a member of said company?

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—3.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Henshaw:

"5. Did said Amos Kendall at any time, and, if so, when, apply to be released from said company? And, if so, what reasons did he assign therefor?

"AYES—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—3.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Henshaw:

"9. Have you any information of persons interested with Mr. Kendall in the profits of buying and selling public lands? If so, state what.

"Answer by Mr. Henshaw:

"I have no information of any persons interested at this time, with Mr. Kendall, in the profits of buying and selling public lands.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Henshaw:

"10. Have you any information of persons who have been interested with Mr. Kendall, since he has been an exective officer, in the profits of buying and selling public lands? If so, state what.

"AYES—Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Wise—2.

"NAYS—Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—4."

In this exhibit of catechism we see neither consistency, nor propriety, nor liberality, nor fairness, in propounding or rejecting interrogatories. Some questions are propounded to some witnesses, which, in substance the same, are rejected as to others. Subjects of inquiry of the deepest interest to the public were peremptorily excluded from investigation. Mr. Woodbury, for example, was not permitted to respond as to the removal of David Melvill, or to explain why it was that he could communicate one paper and withhold another from Congress, touching the same matter, because one was confidential, the other not. Mr. Duane had been called before one committee of investigation, and an answer had been returned to him there, because it was too full for the limited resolution under which that committee was appointed; he was called before this committee to testify as to the grossest abuses on the part of the President in recognising and consulting with unknown and irresponsible private persons, of doubtful character, to the exclusion of those who were his regular cabinet counsellors and constitutional advisers; and the majority would not permit him to testify at all, because he had been called before the other committee, which had also refused to allow him or any other witness to testify at all on the subject of abuses. Mr. Vanderpoel, of New York, was called to testify whether he had not, as was known to a member of the committee, represented that the President desired the resolution of the 17th January, under which this committee was appointed, to pass, and not the amendment requiring specific charges, which was offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island; and to testify, also, as to what authority he had for making this representation to members; and the majority refused to hear him. Mr. Standefer was called, as stated to the committee, to prove that the President of the United States had written letters to Benjamin F. Curry, an Indian agent, which letters were used, and intended to be used, by that subordinate executive officer, publicly, against the election to Congress of Mr. Standefer; that these letters were read publicly, by this agent, to crowds of the people in Mr. Standefer's district, in Tennessee; that there was strong circumstantial evidence to prove that this was done with the knowledge and approbation of the President; and yet the majority would not examine this witness, because the conduct of the President was not involved in the inquiry under the resolution, as it was alleged he was not an officer or agent of the executive departments.

And the witness, Littlefield, was sent for hundreds of miles, for the known object of telling all he knew in relation to the removal of David Melvill, at considerable expense and trouble; and when he arrived he was permitted to testify only as to some stale charges against that injured man, supported only by ex parte proof, taken without notice to him, and trumped up long since his removal, for the obvious purpose of punishing him for daring to complain of wrongs already inflicted. Although there are highly penal laws of the United States against any class of executive officers being concerned in trade, or in the purchase of public lands, or other public property, (see Gordon's Digest, page 30,) and although the charge was made that officers prohibited by law from thus trading and purchasing public lands, and other public property, were, and had been, constantly speculating on their official influence; and although there is the most obvious impropriety and incompatibility in any head of any department being thus tempted and tempting in his place, yet the subjects of dealing and speculating in Indian reservations, wherein there is much foul fraud daily practised on tribes of unprotected savages, whom the United States are bound to protect, and on this Government itself, and whence have, no doubt, sprung such disastrous wars; and of dealing and speculating in public lands, whence, it is supposed, has been generated so much corruption and bribery among the officers of the Government of every description, and private citizens of all classes, were sealed subjects in this committee.

The majority, too, it is proper to state, showed as little industry as zeal in prosecuting the investigations of the committee. They generally voted to adjourn to the latest day; they could not be got to meet more than once a day; a resolution was passed to meet at 10 o'clock A. M. and 7 P. M.; one night session was held on the 16th February, another attempted on the 7th; but two members (Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. WISE) attended, and the resolution to meet twice in twenty-four hours was repealed before it operated twice. Such has been, in general, the course of the committee. Such was to have been expected to be its course from the moment of its appointment. Six friends of the Executive to three of the opposition were placed upon it by the Speaker, who is supposed to owe his election to the influence of the President over a House where there is an overwhelming majority in favor of the administration; and of these six, several were known, by their speeches on the floor, to be utterly opposed to the resolution under which the committee was appointed, and to the investigation which that resolution instituted.

But the appointments and labors of the committee have not been in vain. Though their inquiry has had to contend with the power and popularity of the President—with the majority which his name and influence held in the House—with his official machinery there—with the committee created to smother its efforts—with an unprecedented resistance to its powers by the departments—with one of the worst evils of the times, that gag-law with which patronage rules the silence of the best witnesses—with the heaviest masses and burdens of papers, with which any bureau usually covers up calls for information, and baffles all attempts at analysis or synopsis, except when a partial concealment or a labored self-acquittal is meant—with shortness of time, six weeks, in which to examine the most momentous and voluminous subjects, the witnesses scattered hundreds and thousands of miles over the United States, during the winter season—and though the House discharged from attendance the main witness of all, as to one of the most serious charges against a department, and the committee has since refused to cause him (R. M. Whitney) to be summoned under a resolution stating the strongest special reason for taking his testimony, (see journal, page —,) yet, in spite of every obstacle, the investigation has developed many and important facts which it becomes every man in the nation to know.

It is the duty of the undersigned, also, to present the facts of another transaction, which involves the conduct of the Secretary of State. Reference is made to the facts simply, without comment or the expression of an opinion. A treaty, or pretended treaty, was concluded at New Echota, Georgia, on the 29th day of December, 1835, by Gen. William Carroll and John F. Schermerhorn, on the part of the United States, and the chiefs, headmen, and people, as was said, of the Cherokee tribe of Indians. Whilst the commissioners of the United States were acting, application was made to them to insert an article in that treaty binding this Government to pay a claim, commonly called the Golphin claim. A synopsis of that claim is herewith presented, in the form of the following letter to the commissioners.

"Hon. Wm. Carroll and the Hon. John F. Schermerhorn.

"GENTLEMEN: The Cherokee Indians having, in a late treaty concluded by you as commissioners of the United States appointed for that purpose, expressed their wish that certain traders might be paid their just debts, which were stipulated to be paid by the treaty of 1773, I have taken the liberty of laying before you a short history of them, being more full than heretofore communicated to you.

"From the year 1761 till the date of the treaty, in 1763, these traders had furnished the ordinary supplies to the Indians, on the faith and credit of the Creek and Cherokee nations; that, being in great distress and poverty, the Indians implored the British Crown to accept of a cession of their land, (now Wilkes county, in the State of Georgia,) to the end that their traders might be paid their debts, and enabled to furnish them (the Indians) with goods as usual. Accordingly, in December, 1772, the Colonial Governor of Georgia was instructed to hold a treaty, in compliance with the wishes of the Indians, by which instructions it appears that the British Crown was not to be pledged, on any account, for the payment of those debts, but that the lands intended to be ceded were to be sold, and the proceeds applied, in the first place, to the extinguishment of those debts, and the surplus appropriated to the defence of the colony.

"The treaty was made in 1773, and contains but a single obligation on the part of the British Government, which was the payment of the debts due to the Indian traders from the sale of the ceded lands.

"At the date of the treaty, the Indian traders not only released the British Government, but also the Indians, from all liability on account of the debts of the latter.

"The Colonial Government of Georgia, acting in obedience to instructions, appointed a commission to execute the treaty, by selling the lands comprehended in the treaty, and ascertaining the amount that was respectively due to the Indian traders when the war of the Revolution broke out.

"Before, however, this event happened, on the 2d May, 1775, George Golphin, who was an Indian trader, and held by assignment the claims of other Indian traders, obtained a liquidation of his claims to the amount of £9,791 15s. 5d. of the currency of the then province of Georgia; which sum was again guaranteed to be paid, according to the stipulation of the treaty.

"The effect of the revolutionary war was to place beyond the power of the British Government the performance of the treaty by the means therein specified. But a part of these traders, who were loyal to the Crown during that contest, were afterwards paid by the British Government, notwithstanding the release heretofore referred to.

"Pending the negotiation at Paris, in 1783, a memorial was laid before the American commissioners, in behalf of certain merchants trading to South Carolina and Georgia, asking for indemnification for debts due to them from the Creek and Cherokee Indians, for the payment of which a tract of land was ceded in Georgia in 1773.

"As the American commissioners had no authority to admit or deny the justice of the claims, they were transmitted to Congress.

"It is believed that Congress never acted on this subject; or, if it did, such action was adversely to the claims of the memorialists; for we find that, in July, 1788, an act of the British Parliament was passed, creating a commission to inquire into the claims of sufferers by the cession of Georgia to the Americans.

"And, in 1790, the sum of £49,536, with interest at the rate of four per centum, was appropriated for the payment of claims on lands in Georgia ceded to the Americans.

"Under the expectation of being indemnified by these acts of Parliament, the representative of George Golphin employed Charles Goodwin, Esq., a distinguished lawyer of South Carolina, now deceased, to go to London and receive the amount of his ancestor's just debt, under these acts of Parliament. The mission of Mr. Goodwin resulted in a failure, not on account of the justice of the debts of Golphin, but the obnoxiousness of his conduct during the revolutionary struggle.

"On this side of the Atlantic, the exertions of those interested in these claims have been equally unsuccessful. It did seem equitable that when Georgia had acquired jurisdiction over the ceded territory in question, she ought to have paid these debts. Acting, probably, under this conviction, this State, in 1780, passed an act requiring such Indian traders who were friendly to the independence of the colonies, and had claims on the Indians, for the payment of which the county of Wilkes was ceded, that they lay them before the then or some future Legislature; and whatever was found to be due was to be paid in Treasury certificates, payable in two, three, and four years, bearing interest at six per centum.

"Holding forth, as this act did, a pledge that this debt of Golphin, and all such like, would be paid, his representatives have again and again petitioned the Legislature of Georgia. The uniform course of that Legislature has been to receive the petitions, raise a committee, who report favorably, and then lay it on the table for the balance of the session. None ever questioned the justice of the debt, or the firm and devoted attachment of George Golphin to the liberties of his country.

"However unfaithfully the State of Georgia may seem to have acted on this subject, her conduct will be probably justified by these considerations; she did not, by her own individual act, defeat the fulfilment of the treaty of 1773, but that it was defeated by the act of the United States, as it was a war of all the States united.

"And more especially that, as the State of Georgia, as early as 1783, had set apart for the soldiery and other troops this same territory of Wilkes county, (being then her only valuable and unlocated lands to which the Indian title was then extinguished,) for the purpose of fulfilling her engagements to the continental troops.

"That afterwards, in 1784, when her territory was enlarged by the addition of two other counties, a large section of her fertile lands was reserved, for the space of twelve months, 'for the officers, seamen, and soldiers, who were entitled to lands in that State by any resolve of Congress, or act or resolve of that State.'

"That, still finding the bounties promised to the continental soldiers could not be located, by reason of the smallness of the territory above referred to, Georgia afterwards, in 1785, declared that another portion of her soil should be deemed a reserve for the space of twelve months, 'to make good her engagements to the continental soldiery, and seamen, and officers of the medical department.'

"Thus we find that, before the termination of the revolutionary war, the State of Georgia had actually bestowed, as a resource of carrying on that war, on the continental soldiery, by way of bounty, this same territory, which had been pledged, by the Colonial Government, for the payment of debts due to the Indian traders; and, still finding her engagements to that soldiery unfulfilled, she continued to grant bounties out of her soil. In this aspect of the case, it does appear that, whatever liability appears to rest, in the first place, on the State of Georgia, that liability really and equitably rests upon the United States.

"More than half a century has been passed in earnest and fruitless negotiation with every power capable of doing justice to these claims. The Indians, in the last resort, have been applied to; they have only heard the simple history of these claims, and acknowledged the moral obligation that they ought to be paid; that, as a matter of future security, and to avoid, henceforth, all impotency on this subject, when about crossing the Mississippi, and abandoning the lands of their fathers, they desire that their fathers' debts may be paid.

"MILLEDGE GOLPHIN,
One of the heirs of George Golphin."

An article was inserted (the 20th) embracing the claim, to wit:

"Art. 20. The United States do also hereby guaranty the payment of all unpaid just claims upon the Indians, without expense to them, out of the proper funds of the United States, for the settlement of which a cession or cessions of land has or have been heretofore made by the Indians in Georgia: Provided, The United States, or the State of Georgia, has derived benefit from the said cession or cessions of land, without having made payment to the Indians therefor. It is hereby, however, further agreed and understood, that if the Senate of the United States disapprove of this article, it may be rejected, without impairing any other provision of this treaty, or affecting the Indians in any manner whatever."

The treaty was sent by the President to the Senate, with that article in it. The Senate, May 16, 1836, refused to advise and consent to the ratification of that article, by a vote of 26 to 12. What caused the Senate to reject it thus decidedly is not known, except what appears on its face, that it singularly enough stipulated with the Indians that the United States would pay its own or Georgia's debts out of the proper funds of the United States.

February 13th, the Hon. John Forsyth was called before this committee, and the following examination of him as a witness took place:

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Forsyth:

"1. Were you, or not, personally interested in a certain claim, commonly called the Golphin claim, as to which a stipulation was inserted in the last Cherokee treaty, as sent to the Senate of the United States to be ratified?

"Answer by Mr. Forsyth:

"I have been interested in the Golphin claim since 1827 or 1828, as counsel for the representatives of Golphin, and expect, whenever it is paid, a portion of the sums recovered.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Forsyth:

"2. Do you know whether any person or persons, connected or not with the State Department, or interested or not in said Golphin claim, offered a reward, in money, goods, or other valuable consideration, to a Cherokee chief named John Ross, to assent to the stipulation as to said claim inserted in said treaty?

"Answer by Mr. Forsyth: I do not.

"Question by Mr. Mann to Mr. Forsyth:

"9. Has the Golphin claim, in any manner, been officially before your Department for examination, pending the negotiation of the late treaty with the Cherokee Indians?

"Objected to by Mr. Parks, and adopted, as follows:

"AYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Mann, Mr. Wise—6.

"NAYS—Mr. Parks, Mr. Chaney—2.

"Answer by Mr. Forsyth:

"The Department of State, since it has been under my care, has had no concern with the Golphin claim, other than in certifying some documents among the files of papers relating to a time anterior to the adoption of the federal constitution. All the business of Indian treaties is transacted in the War Department, to which, during the administration of it by Major Eaton, I delivered a statement of the Golphin claim, with a view to have it provided for by some subsequent arrangement with the Creek or Cherokee Indians. That statement having been mislaid, another statement was substituted for it, by the parties interested, during Governor Cass's administration. While the treaty was negotiated here, the representatives of Golphin had an agent (Judge Underwood) in this city, who applied to me to urge the President to admit the claim, which Underwood said the Indians wished to see paid. I declined any conversation with the President on the subject, because of my contingent interest. Governor Cass told me he thought the claim just, but doubted whether it would not be paid by Georgia, and not the United States. The President, as Governor Cass informed me, refused, on that ground, to permit an article respecting it to be put into the treaty. And when the treaty was considered and decided upon in the Cherokee country, the agents of Golphin procured from them the article as it went to the Senate. The claim was not admitted to form part of the treaty, but it was before the Senate on its own merits. The original demand was £9,000. A law of Georgia promises to pay 6 per cent. interest. I had no further connexion with the insertion of the article in the treaty, otherwise than advising the representatives of Golphin, before inserting it, to procure from the Indians an urgent application for the payment of the claim; and all the conversations I had on that subject, prior to the treaty, were with the parties interested, or their attorneys. I applied to Major Eaton and Governor Cass to examine the claim, and furnished means of forming a just opinion. Both were informed of my personal interest, and that what I said to them proceeded from that interest. While the treaty was before the Senate, I conversed on the subject with Mr. Preston, of South Carolina, Mr. Brown, of North Carolina, and Messrs. King and Cuthbert, of Georgia, and perhaps with others; but to no one without a distinct warning that I spoke in the character of counsel for the parties, having a contingent interest. My appeals to them were founded solely on the justice of the claim, and the hardship of the condition of the claimants."

"The following communication was received and read:

"WASHINGTON, February 14, 1837.

"SIR: I ask leave of the committee to correct an error in my statement relative to the amount of the Golphin claim. By referring to document No. 83, of the Senate, you will find a copy of the certificate; and the amount is £9,791 15s. 5d., and not £9,000, as I had supposed yesterday.

"I am, sir, your obedient servant,

"JOHN FORSYTH.

"Hon. HENRY A. WISE,

Chairman of the Committee, &c."

Afterwards, John Ross, the principal chief of the Cherokee nation, was called, and testified as follows:

"Mr. Wise to Mr. Ross:

"1. Please state all that you know respecting the means which were employed, or the influence exerted, by any officer or agent of the executive departments, to have the stipulation respecting the Golphin claim, commonly so called, inserted in the last treaty with the Cherokee nation; and to obtain your assent to the same, after it was inserted, as a chief of that nation or tribe.

"2. Were you offered a reward, bribe, or valuable consideration of any kind—if so, what?—by any officer or agent of either of the executive departments, or by any person, for any officer or agent thereof—if by any one, whom?—to obtain your assent, or that of any other headman or chief of your nation, to said Golphin claim, or to said treaty, in which it was inserted?

"3. Will you please state all that you know respecting the conduct of the various officers, agents, superintendents, or other persons employed or paid by the Government to superintend and negotiate its affairs with the Cherokees, from the year 1828 up to the present period?

"Answer of Mr. John Ross, Indian Chief.

"WASHINGTON CITY, February 25, 1837.

"SIR: In reply to the first question propounded to me by the honorable committee, I have the honor to state that I know of none of the means which were employed, or of the influence exerted, by any of the officers or agents of the executive departments, to have the stipulation respecting the Golphin claim (so called) inserted in the (alleged) Cherokee treaty. That instrument was negotiated and entered into with certain unauthorized individuals of the Cherokee nation, at a time when I was in this city with a delegation who were duly authorized and empowered by said nation to negotiate a treaty with the United States Government. After the arrival of John F. Schermerhorn, the commissioner of the United States, in this city, and of several of the Cherokee individuals who had entered into the aforesaid instrument, and who had come on for the purpose of getting their proceedings ratified by the Government, the duly-authorized delegation, of which I was a member, received from the Cherokee people, through the hands of certain special messengers, their protest against the ratification of the pretended treaty aforesaid, and which was communicated to the War Department for the information of the President. At the same time, the delegation stated their readiness to negotiate with the Government for a treaty, by which the Cherokee difficulties might be satisfactorily and honorably adjusted. A reply was returned, through the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, saying to us, (the delegation,) 'You will distinctly understand that you will not be recognised by the Department as members of a delegation, unless you will unite with those who had come on with the treaty, and sign the same, and co-operate with them to effect its ratification.'

"To the second question, I have the honor to state that no reward, bribe, or valuable consideration of any kind, has been offered me, by any officer or agent of either of the executive departments, or by any person, for any officer or agent thereof, to obtain my assent, or that of any other headman or chief of my nation, to said Golphin claim, or to said instrument in which it was inserted.

"From the nature of the oath which has been administered to me, and the generality of the questions propounded, I feel bound further to state, as concisely and substantially as my memory will permit, such facts known to me as I believe have any bearing upon those questions. Some time during the session of the Congress of 1832-'33, I was called upon in my room at Brown's hotel, on one Sunday morning, by a person who introduced himself as a Mr. Hunter, doorkeeper of the house of Representatives, and who inquired if I was acquainted with Mr. Barney McKinney, of Augusta, Georgia. I replied in the affirmative. He then asked if I knew any thing about the Golphin claim. I replied that Mr. McKinney, to whom he had just alluded, had once been at my house in the Cherokee nation, and was accompanied by Colonel Andrew Erwin; that said McKinney had laid before me certain papers in reference to that claim; that he considered the claim to be a good one against the State of Georgia; and that he had proffered to lease the Cherokee gold mines, and to pay the nation in that claim; that my reply was, that I had no authority to dispose of the gold mines in any manner, nor did I know whether the general council of the nation would be disposed to rent them out; and if the council would make a lease of them, I was sure that it would not agree to accept of that claim in payment, however good it may be against Georgia; because, if that State had proved herself faithless towards the just rights of her own citizens, by withholding payment to that claim, the Cherokees could have no confidence that she would be more faithful towards them in paying it, when transferred to them. Mr. Hunter remarked that he had acted as an agent for the proprietors of that claim, in trying to have it recognised and paid, and that he had spent a good deal of money on that business; so he was interested in said claim. That he had heard it was probable that the Cherokee delegation, then in the city, would enter into a treaty of cession with the Government; and if, in case a treaty be negotiated, and I would get an article inserted in the treaty for the payment of that claim, he would make me interested in it to the amount of $40,000 or $50,000; this proposition was spurned, and the interview broken off. Some short time thereafter, I was again visited in my room by another gentleman, who introduced himself to me as a Mr. Crawford, of Augusta, Georgia, then late Attorney General of that State. This gentleman remarked that he was interested in the Golphin claim, and, from what he had heard of Mr. Hunter's interview with me in reference to that claim, he was sorry to believe that Mr. Hunter had presented the subject before me in a manner that was offensive; and he hoped, from the knowledge I had of his character, and the respect which he entertained for mine, that I would believe him incapable of proposing any thing that would be dishonorable. I related what had passed between Mr. Hunter and myself, and expressed my regret and disapprobation of being thus tampered with. He expressed his disapprobation also of the manner in which Mr. Hunter had presented the subject before me. Mr. Crawford then proposed to surrender into my hands the documents relating to the Golphin claim; and said, if a treaty be entered into with the Government, and the delegation would get an article inserted to bind the United States to pay that claim, the delegation might retain such a portion of the amount of the claim, for the benefit of their nation, as they thought proper—even the one half, so that the residue be paid over to the proper claimants. I refused having any thing to do with the claim, or to examine the documents, because it was not a debt against the Cherokee nation; and if considered as a claim against the United States, it ought to be presented before the proper officers of the Government, for settlement. Some time during the session of the Congress of 1834-'35, William H. Underwood, Esq., of Georgia, who had been employed to defend the rights of the Cherokees before the courts of that State, arrived in this city, unsolicited by the Cherokee delegation, and whilst the delegation were in correspondence with the Secretary of War on the subject of negotiating a treaty. Mr. Underwood remarked to me that he was intrusted with the Golphin claim, and was promised a handsome fee for its collection; that he was poor, and if the delegation negotiated a treaty with the Government, he would take it as a great favor in me if I would secure the insertion of such an article in it, which he would draw up, couched in such language as would not, in the slightest manner, affect the interests or rights of the Cherokees, but which would commit the United States to pay the claim, and that I should be no loser. I replied that he well knew I had every disposition to render him any favor, without remuneration, when in my power to do it honorably, and without injury to the nation. A short period thereafter, when I was preparing a communication to the Secretary of War, embracing certain propositions for a treaty, Mr. Underwood came into my room, and showed me an article which he had drawn up, to embrace the Golphin claim, and asked if I would not, in the concluding part of the communication which I was then writing, insert it as a part of the propositions of the delegation. I replied no; and he retired from the room. Soon after this, Mr. John F. Schermerhorn, a commissioner of the United States, negotiated a proposition, in treaty form, with John Ridge and other individuals of the Cherokee nation, then in this city; and when Mr. Underwood left the city, it was made known to me that the Government had paid his expenses in coming, staying here, and returning home.

"After my return to the Cherokee nation, in the course of the spring of 1835, it was communicated to me that Mr. Underwood and John Ridge had written a letter to the Secretary of War, suggesting that, if the Cherokees were assured that the President would not offer them any other terms for a treaty than were contained in the propositions negotiated with Ridge and others, in all probability they would be induced to adopt them; that a letter, in reply from the Secretary, was returned, making such declarations as had been suggested, extracts of which were then transmitted by Mr. Underwood to certain persons in the nation, for the information of the Cherokees. After this, there followed a letter from the President of the United States to Governor Lumpkin, authorizing the Governor to make it known, for the information of the Cherokees, that, if they did not accept of the propositions offered, he would not, during his administration, offer them any other terms, but give them up to the jurisdiction of the State authorities, to be dealt with as they may think proper. In the course of the summer of that year, Major William Y. Hansell, who had been associated with Mr. Underwood as an attorney at law, paid me a visit at a mineral spring, where I had taken my family for their health. He made known to me that Mr. Forsyth, the Secretary of State of the United States, was then or had been in Georgia, and that he (Hansell) had ascertained from an unquestionable source that Mr. Forsyth was one of the parties interested in the Golphin claim; that he possessed great influence over the President, and, notwithstanding the declarations made by the President through Governor Lumpkin, Mr. Forsyth could and would induce the President to grant an additional sum of money, sufficient to cover the Golphin claim, over and above what was stipulated in the propositions submitted to the nation, if the Cherokees would sanction a treaty upon such terms.

"To the 3d question, I beg leave to remark that a statement to this question would necessarily be very lengthy, which, together with the want of references to such documentary facts as are not at present within my reach, renders it impossible for me to prepare an answer during the present session of Congress. The honorable committee will therefore please to excuse me for simply referring them to the correspondence between myself and associates and the various officers of the Government, and to the memorials and protests submitted both to the executive departments and the Congress of the United States, by myself and colleagues, on the part of the Cherokee nation, from 1828 up to the present session of Congress; and, in conclusion, to lay before them an official general order, (No. 74,) dated 'Headquarters, Army, E. T. and C. N., Fort Cass, November 3, 1836,' and signed 'John E. Wool, Brigadier General commanding.'

"I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient, humble servant,

"JOHN ROSS.

Chairman of the Select Committee of Investigation."

"HEADQUARTERS, ARMY, E. T. AND C. N.,
FORT CASS, November 3, 1836.

"GENERAL ORDER—No. 74.

"I am instructed by the President of the United States, through the War Department, to make known to Mr. John Ross, and all others whom it may concern, that it is his determination to have the late treaty, entered into between the United States and the Cherokee people, and ratified by the Senate the 25th May, 1836, 'religiously fulfilled, in all its parts, terms, and conditions, within the period prescribed;' and that 'no delegation which may be sent' to Washington, 'with a view to obtain new terms, or a modification of those of the existing treaty, will be received or recognised; nor will any intercourse be had with them, directly or indirectly, orally or in writing;' and that the President regards the proceedings of Mr. Ross and his associates, in the late council held at Red Clay, 'as in direct contravention of the plighted faith of their people; and a repetition of them will be considered as indicative of a design to prevent the execution of the treaty, even at the hazard of actual hostilities; and they will be promptly repressed.'

"It is further made known, by instructions from the War Department, that 'if any of our citizens enter the Cherokee country, and incite opposition to the execution of the treaty,' they will be proceeded against according to the laws of the State, if any exist on the subject, in which they may enter; and if there should be 'no law of the State which can be brought to bear on them, and under which they may be removed,' it is the opinion of the President,' as expressed through the War Department, 'that they may be removed' out of the country 'under the 6th article of the treaty,' in which the United States guaranty that the Cherokees shall be 'protected against interruption and intrusion from citizens of the United States who may attempt to settle in the country,' unless it is with the express consent 'of the committee who are acting under the 12th article of the treaty; and, by the terms of that article, they alone are authorized to give it.'

"All officers of the army, whether commanding volunteers or regular troops, under my command, are required and directed to make known to all persons residing or who may come within the range of their respective commands the contents of this order; and to make diligent search and inquiry in regard to all citizens who may enter the Cherokee country and incite opposition, or interfere with the due execution of the treaty, and report their names and places of residence, without delay, to general headquarters, in order that they may be proceeded against according to the laws of the country and the instructions of the President of the United States. They are also required and directed to prevent all meetings and to break up all councils coming to their knowledge, assembled in the Cherokee country, for the purpose of opposing the treaty or discussing its non-execution.

Brigadier General commanding."

The amount of this Golphin claim, principal and interest, is estimated at about $150,000.

The undersigned deems it to be his duty to present also another subject clearly before the House and the nation.

On the 11th July, 1836, the Treasury Department issued a circular to the land receivers and deposit banks, requiring specie in payment for the public lands. This circular, it is believed, was dictated by the President, without the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury; it is believed to have benefited speculators in the public lands only, many of whom are charged to be officers of the Government; and the circular itself was thought to be, if not in violation of law, a suspension of law—at least in violation of a sacred principle of civil liberty, "that all power of suspending laws, or the execution of laws, by any authority without the consent of the representatives of the people, is injurious to their rights, and ought not to be exercised." The circular was an abuse in itself, but its application, or rather the exception in its application, was a greater abuse still, as the following correspondence between the Branch Bank of Alabama, at Decatur, and the Secretary of the Treasury, will show.

The cashier of the Branch of the Bank of the State of Alabama, at Decatur, addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated July 28, 1836, in which he says:

"BRANCH OF THE BANK OF THE STATE OF ALABAMA, DECATUR, July 28, 1836.

"SIR: In consequence of your letter under date of the 11th instant, addressed to the receivers of public money," &c. [meaning the circular requiring specie for the public lands,] "the directors of this institution have ordered me to make the following inquiry :

"In consequence of the purchase by you of five hundred thousand dollars of Alabama State bonds, being for the increase of the capital of this branch bank, the payment of which has been agreed to be made, from time to time, by the receiver of moneys at Pontitoc, for the lands sold, or to be sold, for the benefit of the Chickasaw nation, as fully expressed in the terms of purchase and sale, under date 31st March, 1836, I would, therefore, very respectfully beg leave to inquire whether you will be pleased to order the said receiver at Pontitoc to accept, in payment for said public lands, the notes, or certificates of deposit, of this branch bank, to the amount of $500,000, or such an amount as may be due this branch bank at the time of said payments being made. This bank, as a matter of course, agreeing to redeem its own notes by checks at sight—in this instance, payable either at the Union Bank of Louisiana or Citizens' Bank, New Orleans; the Mechanics' Bank, Philadelphia, or the Phoenix bank, New York; for any sum or sums over and above the amount due to it from the Treasury, and which might be paid to the receiver at Pontitoc for Chickasaw lands during the present year.

"This request is not made with a view to the accommodation of the bank so much as for the convenience of the people, particularly the citizens of this valley, a number of whom have already made settlements in the Chickasaw country, and are consequently about to remove there. It is, therefore, at their suggestion that the directory of the institution have been induced to request such an application to be made; for (permit me to say) this branch bank is fully prepared to afford its customers the necessary facilities for the payment of their lands in specie dollars; but the trouble and risk in the transmission of such being on all hands acknowledged to be great, through a country but thinly peopled, and where several robberies and depredations have been committed, that we are anxious that the same facilities which have heretofore been extended to them should be continued.

"Under the peculiar circumstances of the case, this branch bank having to receive a large proportion of the whole amount of money which will have to be paid at Pontitoc for lands sold there this fall, it is hoped the arrangement sought for will not be considered in any way injurious to the public interest, while it would be a great accommodation to the citizens of this section of country, as well as to this institution. I am in daily expectation of receiving the bonds referred to from the bank of the State at Tuscaloosa, which, when received, shall be executed immediately, and forwarded for the amounts as received from the receiver at Pontitoc.

"With greatest respect, I have the honor to be, &c.

"HON. LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury."

The reply of the Secretary was as follows :

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, August 11, 1836.

"SIR: Your communication of the 28th ultimo, respecting the receipt of the notes of your bank by the receiver at Pontitoc, to the amount of your contract with this Department, has been received.

"I am willing that he should take your notes to the extent of what is coming to your bank, under the contract, upon your agreeing to receive them from him as money. He is authorized to do this in that way, and to that extent, on your showing him this letter; but I cannot alter the regulations as to notes generally and for general purposes.

"I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"LEVI WOODBURY, Sec. Treasury.

"JAMES DURN0, Esq.,

Cashier Branch Bank of Alabama, Decatur."

Thus, by this circular, and this exception under it, not only were the laws suspended, but their uniformity destroyed, by the authority of the President alone, immediately after Congress was in session. One portion of the people was accommodated, in being allowed to pay for public lands in convenient bank notes, whilst their neighbors were obliged to pay in specie, at every cost, and trouble, and risk of transportation. One bank's notes were received to any amount less than $500,000 dollars, whilst the banks of the surrounding States, or of Tennessee at least, were run hard for every dollar or coin which could be had. The presidential election was then fast approaching; and what effect this indulgence, and that contained in the circular as to bank notes of Mississippi banks, for lands in Mississippi, had upon the people of the two States, Alabama and Mississippi, it is not difficult to determine.

There are a number of other cases which might be selected from the testimony, the whole mass of which is submitted, but the committee has not had time to report particularly upon them. The undersigned, however, would call the attention of the House particularly to a report of Amos Kendall and John P. Van Ness, commissioners appointed, by authority of the President, to receive and report testimony touching certain charges preferred by H. Gassaway; and also to the testimony of Commodore Morris and Charles W. Goldsborough, in relation to said charges, in the appendix to the journal of this committee. One thing is remarkable about this notable commission, that the commissioners, it seemed, issued subpoenas for witnesses in the form of "request," and it is believed that one or both of them administered corporal oaths. How far the constitution of this tribunal was in the competency of executive authority, the undersigned is not prepared to say. But this [they] are prepared to say: that, whilst the President was denouncing this committee as worse than a Spanish inquisition, he should have looked well to his own acts instituting commissions of inquiry. Certain it is, that though these commissioners reported very strongly against several officers in the Navy Department, not one of them, as far as this committee is informed, has ever been removed from office.

It had been represented to a member of the committee that disbursing officers had unnecessarily drawn specie from the deposite banks, after the issuing of the Treasury circular requiring specie payments for public lands, and sold the same as merchandise, for their private profit, to those who required specie at the land offices. This subject was left unexamined, except by a call on the Department, which resulted in developing nothing of the abuse. The subjects of frauds in Indian reservations, and in the purchase and sales of public lands, in connexion with the legislation of Congress, as well as the executive administration, were necessarily left untouched, although the attention of the committee was called to them in various ways.

[See anonymous letters, and the examinations of Amos Kendall and David Henshaw; see, also, the letter of R. T. Archer, and the answer of the Department to the call of the committee, on its subject-matter.]

The minority cannot do less than justice to Colonel Towson, the paymaster general of the army, by saying that a complaint was made against his official conduct by a person named Hobby, and he promptly asked for inquiry and investigation, as the best means of doing justice both to the Government and the officer; the committee had not time to examine and report upon his case, and can only refer to his testimony for the facts of his defence. For other matters, also of great interest, the minority must refer generally to the testimony of the Honorable H. L. White, John Bell, Balie Peyton, Francis W. Pickens, Henry A. Wise, Amos Kendall, David Henshaw, John Ross, and others who were examined. Many who were summoned and sworn could not be examined; some for the want of time, and others because they would not have been permitted to testify as to the matter of evidence for which they were called.

Treaty with Spain.

There is not time, in fact, or opportunity, (part of the journal of the committee having been until the present moment in the hands of the printer,) to digest and properly arrange the facts which have been proved. But, in conclusion, the undersigned would humbly hope that the labors of the committee may be fruitful of health and purity to the administration of the Government. Whether inquiry results in vindicating public officers, and demonstrating their integrity and capacity, or in detecting and exposing their errors of maleadministration, their characters on the one hand, and the interests of the Government on the other, are well worth the trouble and the cost of inquiry. The wisest system of laws is no better than the worst, when corruptly and ignorantly administered; and the worst system as wholesome as the best, when administered by pure, patriotic, capable, and independent public servants, who act officially with a single eye to the public good.

All which is respectfully submitted, as a substitute for the report of the majority. HENRY A. WISE.

From Don Angel Calderon de la Barca, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Spain in the United States of America.

WASHINGTON, March 10, 1836.

SIR: His excellency the first Secretary of State and Affairs of her Catholic Majesty, my august sovereign, has addressed the following communication, under date of the 21st of November last, to the legation under my charge:

"A citizen of the republic and member of its Congress, named Mr. White, has solicited from the Queen Government, in virtue of powers conferred upon him by various Spanish inhabitants of the Floridas, legalized copies of certain public documents, now in the archives of this Department, relating to the cession of the Floridas, to be used in defending the rights of the said persons to the possession of lands and property, in a suit which is to be decided in January next in the Supreme Court of those States.

"Her Majesty having been informed on the subject, has been pleased to accede to this request; in consequence of which, and by royal order, I transmit to you the accompanying copies of the said papers, that you may deliver them to Mr. White, to be used by him as he may judge proper for the benefit of his clients."

I have therefore the honor to communicate to you the above, and to send you the documents referred to. Be pleased, sir, to acknowledge the receipt of them, and to accept the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

A. CALDERON DE LA BARCA.

B.

Preliminary Convention between the Kings of France and Spain, for the cession of Louisiana to the latter.

Translated from a certified copy of the original in the French language, deposited in the archives of the Department of State at Madrid.

The Most Christian King, being firmly resolved to strengthen and perpetuate the bonds of tender amity which unite him to his cousin the Catholic King, proposes in consequence to act with his Catholic Majesty at all times and in all circumstances in a perfect uniformity of principles, for the common glory of their house and the reciprocal interests of their kingdoms.

With this view, his Most Christian Majesty, being fully sensible of the sacrifices made by the Catholic King, in generously uniting with him for the restoration of peace, desires, on this occasion, to give him a proof of the strong interest which he takes in satisfying him and affording advantages to his crown.

The Most Christian King has accordingly authorized his minister, the Duke de Choiseul, to deliver to the Marquis de Grimaldi, the ambassador of the Catholic King, in the most authentic form, an act, whereby his Most Christian Majesty cedes in entire possession, purely and simply, without exception, to his Catholic Majesty and his successors, in perpetuity, all the country known under the name of Louisiana, as well as New Orleans and the island in which that place stands.

But as the Marquis de Grimaldi is not informed with sufficient precision of the intentions of his Catholic Majesty, he has thought proper only to accept the said cession conditionally, and sub spe rati, [under expectation that it will be ratified,] until he receives the orders expected by him from the King his master, which, if conformable to the desires of his Most Christian Majesty, as he hopes they will be, will be followed by the authentic act of cession of the said country; stipulating also the measures and the time, to be fixed by common accord, for the evacuation of Louisiana and New Orleans, by the subjects of his Most Christian Majesty, and for the possession of the same by those of his Catholic Majesty.

In testimony whereof, we, the respective ministers, have signed the present preliminary convention, and have affixed to it the seals of our arms.

Done at Fontainebleau, on the third of November, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-two.

THE DUKE DE CHOISEUL.

To the copy from which the above translation was made are appended the certificates of Don Ceferino Cevallos, archivist of the Department of State of Spain, to its exact conformity with the original; and of Don Angel Calderon de la Barca, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Spain in the United States, of its having been received by him from the first Secretary of State of Spain, and delivered to the Hon. J. M. White, of Florida.

Definitive act of cession of Louisiana by the King of France to the King of Spain.

Translated by Robert Greenhow, translator of foreign languages to the Department of State, from an authentic copy of the original in the Department of State of Spain, to which copy are appended the certificate of Don Ceferino Cevallos, archivist of the Department of State of Spain, that it is a true copy from the original, and the certificate of Don A. Calderon de la Barca, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Spain in the United States, that it was received by him officially from the first Secretary of State of Spain, and delivered to the Hon. J. M. White, of Florida.

Louis, by the grace of God, King of France and Navarre, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting: Whereas our very dear and well-beloved cousin, the Duke de Choiseul, peer of our realm, knight of our orders and of the golden fleece, lieutenant general of our armies, governor of Touraine, colonel general of the Swiss and Grisons, grand master and superintendent general of the posts and relays of France, our Minister and Secretary of State for the Departments of War and Marine and the correspondence with the courts of Madrid and Lisbon, did sign, in our name, with the Marquis de Grimaldi, knight of our orders, gentleman of the chamber, in exercise of our very dear and well-beloved brother and cousin the Catholic King, and his ambassador extraordinary near us, a preliminary convention, whereby, in order to give to our said brother and cousin a new testimonial of our tender friendship, of the strong interest which we take in satisfying him and promoting the welfare of his crown, and of our sincere desire to strengthen and render indissoluble the bonds which unite the French and Spanish nations, we ceded to him entire and perpetual possession of all the country known under the name of Louisiana, together with New Orleans and the island in which that city stands, which convention had only been signed conditionally and sub spe rati by the Marquis de Grimaldi: and whereas our said brother and cousin the Catholic King, animated by the same sentiments towards us which we have evinced on this occasion, has agreed to the said cession, and ratified the conditional acceptance made by his said ambassador extraordinary, which convention and ratification are here inserted, word for word, as follows:

Don Carlos, by the grace of God, King of Castile, of Leon, of Arragon, of the Two Sicilies, of Jerusalem, of Navarre, of Granada, of Toledo, of Valencia, of Galicia, of Majorca, of Seville, of Sardinia, of Cordova, of Corsica, of Murcia, of Jaen, of the Algarves, of Algesiras, of Gibraltar, of the Canary Islands, of the East and West Indies, and the islands and main land of the ocean; Archduke of Austria; Duke of Burgundy, of Brabant and Milan; Count of Hapsburg, of Flanders, of Tyrol, and of Barcelona; Lord of Biscay and of Molina, &c.

Whereas, on the third day of the present month, the preliminaries of a peace were signed between the crowns of Spain and France on the one part, and those of England and Portugal on the other, and the Most Christian King, my very dear and well-beloved cousin, purely from the nobleness of his heart, and the love and friendship in which we live, thought proper to dispose that the Marquis de Grimaldi, my ambassador extraordinary near his royal person, and the Duke de Choiseul, his Minister of State, should on the same day sign a convention, by which the crown of France ceded immediately to that of Spain the country known by the name of Louisiana, together with New Orleans and the island in which that city stands, and by which my said ambassador agrees to the cession only conditionally sub spe rati, as he is not furnished with orders to execute it absolutely; the tenor of which convention is the following:

The Most Christian King, being firmly resolved to strengthen and perpetuate the bonds of tender amity which unite him to his cousin the Catholic King, proposes in consequence to act with his Catholic Majesty, at all times and in all circumstances, in a perfect uniformity of principle, for the common glory of their house and the reciprocal interests of their kingdoms.

With this view, his Most Christian Majesty, being fully sensible of the sacrifices made by the Catholic King in generously uniting with him for the restoration of peace, desires, on this occasion, to give him a proof of the strong interest which he takes in satisfying him and affording advantages to his crown.

The Most Christian King has accordingly authorized his minister, the Duke de Choiseul, to deliver to the Marquis de Grimaldi, the ambassador of the Catholic King, in the most authentic form, an act whereby his Most Christian Majesty cedes, in entire possession, purely and simply, without exception, to his Catholic Majesty and his successors, in perpetuity, all the country known under the name of Louisiana, as well as New Orleans and the island in which that place stands.

But, as the Marquis de Grimaldi is not informed with sufficient precision of the intentions of his Catholic Majesty, he has thought proper only to accept the said cession conditionally and sub spe rati, until he receives the orders expected by him from the King his master, which, if conformable with the desires of his Most Christian Majesty, as he hopes they will be, will be followed by the authentic act of cession of the said country, stipulating also the measures and the time, to be fixed by common accord, for the evacuation of Louisiana and New Orleans, by the subjects of his Most Christian Majesty, and for the possession of the same by those of his Catholic Majesty.

In testimony whereof, we, the respective ministers, have signed the present preliminary convention, and have affixed to it the seals of our arms.

THE MARQUIS DE GRIMALDI.

Therefore, in order to establish between the Spanish and French nations the same spirit of union and friendship which should subsist as they do in the hearts of their sovereigns, I, therefore, take pleasure in accepting, as I do accept, in proper form, the said act of cession, promising also to accept those which may hereafter be judged necessary for carrying it into entire and formal execution, and authorizing the said Marquis de Grimaldi to treat, conclude, and sign them.

In testimony whereof, I have ordered these presents to be drawn up, signed by my hand, sealed with my privy seal, and countersigned by my Councillor of State and chief Secretary of State and War. Given at San Lorenzo el Real, on the thirteenth of November, seventeen hundred and sixty-two.

THE KING.

Countersigned: RICARDO WALL.

The said acceptance and ratification having been approved by us, and regarded as a strong evidence of the friendship and good will of our very dear and well-beloved cousin the Catholic King, we renew and confirm by these presents the cession of Louisiana and of New Orleans, with the island in which that city stands, promising immediately to conclude with our said brother and cousin a convention, in which the measures to be taken in concert for executing and consummating this cession to our mutual satisfaction will be fixed by common accord. In faith whereof, we have caused these presents to be drawn up, which we have signed with our hands, and have affixed to them our secret seal.

Given at Versailles, on the twenty-third day of the month of November, in the year of grace one thousand seven hundred and sixty-two, and of our reign the forty-eighth.

LOUIS.

By the King:

CHOISEUL, DUKE DE PRASLIN.

E and F.

The seventh article of the definitive treaty of peace and amity between the Kings of France, Spain, and England, signed at Paris on the 10th of February, 1763; which is word for word the same with the sixth article of the preliminary convention between the same Powers, signed at Fontainebleau on the 3d of November, 1762.

Translated from authentic copies of both the articles in the French language, which have been found to be identical, by Robert Greenhow, translator of foreign languages to the Department of State of the United States; to which copies are appended the certificates of Don Ceferino Cevallos, keeper of the archives of the Department of State at Madrid, that they are exact transcripts from the originals, and of Don A. Calderon de la Barca, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Spain, that they were transmitted to him by the Secretary of State of Spain, and delivered to the Hon. J. M. White, of Florida.

ARTICLE 7 or 6. In order to re-establish peace on solid and durable foundations, and to remove forever all motives for dispute respecting the limits of the French and British territories on the American continent, it has been agreed that the limits between the States of his Most Christian Majesty and those of his Britannic Majesty, in that part of the world, shall hereafter be irrevocably fixed by a line drawn along the middle of the river Mississippi, from its source, to the river Iberville; and thence, by another line, through the middle of that river and of the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, to the sea; and, for this purpose, the Most Christian King cedes to his Britannic Majesty, and guarantees to him, the entire possession of the river and port of Mobile, and of all that he possesses or should have possessed on the left bank of the river Mississippi, with the exception of New Orleans, and of the island whereon that city stands, which are to remain subject to France; it being understood that the navigation of the Mississippi river is to be equally free to the subjects of Great Britain and of France, in its whole breadth and extent, from its source to the sea, and particularly that part between the said island of New Orleans and the right bank of the river, as well as the entrance and departure by its mouth. It is moreover stipulated, that vessels belonging to the subjects of either nation are not to be detained, searched, nor obliged to pay any duty whatsoever. The stipulations contained in the fourth article, in favor of the inhabitants of Canada, are to be of equal effect with regard to the inhabitants of the countries ceded by this article.

VERSAILLES, April 21, 1764.

SIR: The King has caused the necessary orders to be issued for the surrender of the country of Louisiana, with New Orleans and the island in which the said city stands, into the hands of the commissioner whom his Catholic Majesty may appoint to receive them. I have sent the same papers to the Marquis D'Ossum, who will have the honor to present them to his Catholic Majesty. Your excellency will see that the King's orders are entirely conformable with the acts signed in 1762, and that his Majesty has caused some articles to be inserted, equally conducive to the tranquillity of the country after it is in the possession of his Catholic Majesty, and to the happiness of its inhabitants.

I have the honor to be, with great esteem, your excellency's most humble and obedient servant,

THE DUKE DE CHOISEUL.

J. M. White, of Florida.

Treaty with Spain.

MONSIEUR DABADIE: by a convention made at Fontainebleau, on the 3d of November, 1762, I ceded, of my own free will, to my very dear and well-beloved cousin the King of Spain, and to his successors and heirs in perpetuity, purely, simply, and without exception, all the country known by the name of Louisiana, together with New Orleans and the island in which that city stands; and by another act, made at the Escorial, and signed by the King of Spain on the 13th of November of the same year, his Catholic Majesty accepted the cession of the said country of Louisiana, and of the city and island of New Orleans, conformably with the copies of the said acts which you will receive with this. I now write to inform you of my intention, which is, that as soon as this letter and the annexed copies reach you, whether through the officers of his Catholic Majesty or directly by the French ships charged with their delivery, you are to surrender into the hands of the Governor or officer appointed for the purpose, by the King of Spain, the said country and colony of Louisiana, and the posts dependent on it, together with the city and island of New Orleans, such as they may be on the day of the said surrender; as it is my wish that they should belong in future to his Catholic Majesty, to be governed and administered by his Governors and officers as his property, entirely and without exception.

I therefore order you, as soon as the Governor and troops of his Catholic Majesty arrive in the said countries and colony, to put them in possession, and to withdraw all the officers, soldiers, and persons, employed in my service, who may be there yet in garrison, sending back to France, or my other American colonies, those who may not choose to remain under the Spanish dominion. It is, moreover, my pleasure, that, after the evacuation of the said posts and city of New Orleans, you should collect all the papers and documents relative to the finances and administration of the colony of Louisiana, and bring them to France, for the regulation of the accounts. It is nevertheless my wish that you should deliver to the said Governor, or officer appointed for the purpose, all papers or documents which may specially concern the Government of the colony, either as relating to the territory and its limits, or to the savages, and to the different posts, after having taken the proper receipts for your discharge; and that you should give to the said Governor all the information in your power to enable him to govern the said colony to the satisfaction of his Catholic Majesty. And in order that the said session may be conducted to the mutual satisfaction of both nations, it is my will that an inventory be made of all the artillery, arms, ammunition, effects, stores, hospitals, ships, &c., belonging to me in the said colony, which inventory is to be signed in duplicate, by you and by the commissioner of his Catholic Majesty. Finally, it is my will that, after having placed the Spanish commissioner in possession of the public buildings, a statement be made of the value of the said effects which may remain in the country, in order that the amount resulting from the said valuation may be paid by his Catholic Majesty. At the same time, I hope, for the advantage and tranquillity of the inhabitants of the colony of Louisiana, and I promise myself, from the friendship and affection of his Catholic Majesty, that he will give orders to his Governor, and to all other officers employed in his service in the colony and in the city of New Orleans, that the ecclesiastics and the religious houses providing for the spiritual wants of the people and for the supply of the missions, may continue their functions, and enjoy the rights, privileges, and exemptions, allowed to them by the titles of their establishments; that the ordinary judges and the superior council may continue to dispense justice according to the laws, forms, and usages, of the colony; that the inhabitants may be kept and maintained in their possessions; that they may be confirmed in the ownership of their property, according to the grants which may have been made to them by the Governors and ordonneurs of the colony, and that the said grants be considered, reputed, and confirmed, by his Catholic Majesty, although they might not have been confirmed by me. I hope, moreover, that his Majesty will be pleased to give to his new subjects of Louisiana the same marks of protection and kindness which they have received under my authority, and of which the misfortunes of war alone have prevented them from experiencing the most advantageous effects. I order you to have this (my letter) registered by the superior council of New Orleans, so that the different estates of the colony may be informed of its contents, and may have recourse to it when necessary. And these being the sole objects of the present letter, I pray God, M. Dabadie, that he will keep you in his holy charge.

Given at Versailles, on the 21st of April, 1764. LOUIS.

Countersigned: THE DUKE DE CHOISEUL.

I, Don Ceferino Cevallos, commander of the royal American order of Isabel the Catholic, one of the Council of State of her Majesty, her Secretary and official archivist of the Department of State, do certify, that among the documents in the archives under my care, is the treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation, concluded between the King our lord and the United States of America, signed at San Lorenzo el Real on the 27th of October, 1795, and ratified at Aranjuez on the 25th of April, 1796; of which treaty the second article is as follows:

"ARTICLE 2. In order to avoid all dispute respecting the limits between the territories of the two high contracting parties, it has been agreed and declared in the present article, that the southern boundary of the United States, which divides their territory from the Spanish colonies of West Florida and East Florida, shall be a line beginning at the Mississippi, at the northernmost part of the thirty-first degree of latitude north of the equator, and thence proceeding directly to the east, to the middle of the river Appalachicola or Chattahoochie; thence, along the middle of that river, to its juncture with Flint river; thence, in a straight line, to the source of the river St. Mary; and thence, passing down through the middle of that river, to the Atlantic ocean. And the two Powers have agreed, that if there should be any troops, garrisons, or establishments, belonging to either of the two parties, in the territory of the other, according to the limits above mentioned, they shall retire from the said territory within six months after the ratification of this treaty, or earlier if possible, and they shall have permission to carry with them the goods and effects which they may possess."

In faith of which, by order of his excellency the first Secretary of State, I have given the present at Madrid, on the 10th of November, 1835.

Preliminary and secret treaty between France and Spain, of October 1st, 1800, for the enlargement of the territories of the Duke of Parma, and the restoration of Louisiana to France.

Translated by Robert Greenhow, translator of foreign languages to the Department of State of the United States.

from an authentic copy of the original, to which were annexed the certificates of Don Ceferino Cevallos, keeper of the archives of the Department of State at Madrid, that it was faithfully transcribed from the original in his care, and of Don Angel Calderon de la Barca, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Spain in the United States of America, that it was received by him from the Secretary of State of Spain, and delivered to the Hon. J. M. White, of Florida.

Bonaparte, First Consul, in the name of the French people :

The Consuls of the republic having seen and examined the preliminary and secret treaty concluded, determined, and signed, on the ninth Vendémiaire, of the year nine, [first of October, eighteen hundred,] by General Alexandre Berthier, minister extraordinary of the French republic, in virtue of full powers conferred in him to that effect, with Don Louis d'Orquijo, knight of the order of Charles the Third and that of Saint John of Jerusalem, first Secretary of State to his Majesty the King of Spain, who was likewise furnished with full powers, of which treaty and powers the following is the tenor, to wit :

[TREATY.]

Preliminary and secret treaty between the French republic and his Catholic Majesty the King of Spain, respecting the enlargement of the dominions of his Royal Highness the infant Duke of Parma in Italy, and the restoration of Louisiana.

His Catholic Majesty having always manifested much solicitude to procure an enlargement of the territories of his Royal Highness the Duke of Parma, so as to place his States on a footing conformable with his dignity ; and the French republic, on its part, having long since signified to his Majesty the King of Spain the desire to be again put in possession of the colony of Louisiana ; the two Governments having communicated to each other their views with regard to these objects of common interest, and circumstances permitting them to enter into engagements calculated to insure, as far as relates to themselves, this mutual satisfaction ; they have authorized to that effect, namely, the French republic, citizen Alexandre Berthier, general-in-chief, and his Catholic Majesty, Don Mariano Louis d'Orquijo, knight of the order of Charles the Third and of that of Saint John of Jerusalem, his Councillor of State, his ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary near the Batavian republic, and his first Secretary of State ad interim, who, having exchanged their powers, have agreed upon the following articles, with the reserve that they are to be ratified :

ARTICLE 1. The French republic engages to procure for his Royal Highness the infant Duke of Parma an enlargement of his territories in Italy, sufficient to give to his States a population of from a million to twelve hundred thousand inhabitants, with the title of King, and all the rights, prerogatives, and pre-eminences, attached to the royal dignity ; and the French republic engages to obtain, to that effect, the assent of his Majesty the Emperor and King, and of the other States interested, so that his Royal Highness the Duke of Parma may be placed in incontestable possession of the said territories, on the conclusion of the peace between the French republic and his Imperial Majesty.

ART. 2. The enlargement of the dominions of his Royal Highness the Duke of Parma may consist of Tuscany, in case the negotiations now in progress between the French Government and his Imperial Majesty should place that country at the disposition of the former Government ; it might also consist of the three Roman legations, or of any other provinces of continental Italy forming a compact State.

ART. 3. His Catholic Majesty promises and engages, on his part, six months after the full and entire execution of the conditions and stipulations above mentioned, relative to his Royal Highness the Duke of Parma, to restore to the French republic the colony and province of Louisiana, in the same extent which it now has under the dominion of Spain and of other States.

ART. 4. His Catholic Majesty will give the necessary orders for the occupation of Louisiana by France, as soon as the States composing the enlargement of the dominions of the Duke of Parma are placed in the power of his Royal Highness. The French republic may, however, defer taking possession of it, according to its own convenience. When the occupation is to be effected, the States directly or indirectly concerned will agree upon the ulterior conditions which may be required for their common advantage, and for that of the respective inhabitants.

ART. 5. His Catholic Majesty engages to deliver to the French republic, in the ports of Spain in Europe, one month after the execution of the stipulation relative to the Duke of Parma, six ships of war, in good condition, pierced for seventy-four guns each, armed, equipped, and ready to receive French crews and provisions.

ART. 6. As the stipulations of the present treaty have no injurious tendency, and leave the rights of all undisturbed, it cannot be expected that they should give umbrage to any Power. Nevertheless, should it prove otherwise, and should the two States be attacked or menaced in consequence of their execution, the two Powers engage to make common cause, in order to repel the aggression ; as, also, for the purpose of taking conciliatory measures for the preservation of peace with all their neighbors.

ART. 7. The engagements contained in the present treaty are in no point at variance with those set forth in the treaty of alliance signed at Saint Ildefonso on the 2d of Fructidor, year the fourth, (18th August, 1796 ;) on the contrary, they unite the interests of the two Powers by new links, and they strengthen the guarantees stipulated in the treaty of alliance, with regard to all cases to which they should apply.

ART. 8. The ratification of the present preliminary articles shall be drawn up and exchanged within one month from the date of the present treaty, or earlier if possible.

In faith whereof, we, the undersigned ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic and of his Catholic Majesty, in virtue of our respective powers, have signed the present preliminary articles, and have affixed to them the seals of our arms.

Treaty with Spain.

[POWER.]

Don Carlos, by the grace of God, King of Castile, of Leon, of Arragon, of the Two Sicilies, of Jerusalem, of Navarre, of Granada, of Toledo, of Valencia, of Galicia, of Majorca, of Seville, of Sardinia, of Cordova, of Corsica, of Murcia, of Jean, of Algarves, of Algeiras, of Gibraltar, of the Canary Islands, of the East and West Indies, the islands and main land of the ocean; Archduke of Austria; Duke of Burgundy, of Brabant, and of Milan; Count of Hapsburg, of Flanders, of Tyrol, and of Barcelona; Lord of Biscay and of Molina, &c., having communicated to the First Consul of the French republic my anxious wishes to procure for my beloved brother and cousin, the infant Duke of Parma, some augmentation of his estates in Italy, in order to indemnify him for the repeated losses which he has naturally suffered, in consequence of existing circumstances, the said First Consul has given me to understand that this subject might be discussed and settled between himself and my person; whereunto he declared his own willingness, as warranted by the relations of amity and alliance which unite us. I have therefore resolved to appoint, for the execution of this important business, a person duly qualified for entering on, prosecuting, and concluding the affair, until it be ready for my ratification; and being well satisfied with you, Don Mariano Louis de Orquijo, knight pensioner of the royal and distinguished Spanish order of Charles the Third and of that of Malta, of my Council of State, my ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary near the Batavian republic, and my first Secretary of State ad interim, on account of your capacity and tried zeal in my service, I have determined to confer upon you full power, in the most ample form, to treat with the person or persons authorized by the French Government, respecting the increase and enlargement of the estates of my brother and cousin the infant Duke of Parma, and all points connected with that subject, and to regulate, adjust, and sign all articles, agreements, and conventions, which may conduce to the completion of the said affair, reserving to myself, however, the right of ratifying them.

In faith whereof, I have caused the present to be issued, signed by my hand, sealed with my secret seal, and countersigned by my Secretary of State, and of the universal department of grace and justice of Spain and the Indies, at Saint Ildefonso, on the 1st of October, eighteen hundred.

THE KING.

Countersigned: JOSE ANTONIO CAVALLERO.

[RATIFICATION.]

In virtue of the 49th article of the constitution, I approve the foregoing treaty, in all and each of its articles therein contained, declaring that it is accepted, ratified, and confirmed, and promising that it shall be inviolably observed.

In faith whereof, these presents have been issued, signed, countersigned, and sealed with the great seal of the republic, at Paris, on the twenty-seventh of Vendémiaire, in the ninth year of the French republic, (19th of October, eighteen hundred.)

Treaty of March 21, 1801, between the French republic and Spain.

Translated from a certified copy of the original, in French and Spanish, deposited in the archives of the Department of State at Madrid.

The First Consul of the French republic and his Catholic Majesty, desiring to establish definitively what States are to be given, as equivalents for those of Parma, to the son of the present Duke, the infant Don Ferdinand, brother of the Queen of Spain, have agreed upon the following articles, and have authorized to form this treaty, to wit: the First Consul, citizen Lucien Bonaparte, the present ambassador of the republic near his Catholic Majesty, and his Catholic Majesty the Prince of the Peace, who have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The reigning Duke of Parma renounces, for himself and his heirs, forever, the Dutchy of Parma, with all of its dependencies, in favor of the French republic; and his Catholic Majesty guarantees this renunciation.

ART. 2. The Grand Dutchy of Tuscany, which has been likewise renounced by the Grand Duke, and ceded to the French republic, under the guarantee of the Emperor of Germany, shall be given to the son of the Duke of Parma, in compensation for his States which have been ceded by his father, the infant, and in virtue of another treaty previously made between his Catholic Majesty and the First Consul of the French republic.

ART. 3. The Prince of Parma will proceed to Florence, where he will be recognised as sovereign of all the States belonging to the Grand Dutchy, and he will receive, in the most solemn form, from the hands of the constituted authorities of the country, the keys and the oath of vassalage due to him as the sovereign. The First Consul will aid, with all his forces, in the peaceful accomplishment of this convention.

ART. 4. The Prince of Parma shall be recognised as King of Tuscany, with all the honors due to his rank; and the First Consul will cause him to be acknowledged and treated as such King by all the other Powers whose recognitions should precede the act of possession.

ART. 5. The dependent portion of the Isle of Elba, belonging to Tuscany, shall remain in the power of the French republic; and the First Consul shall give as an equivalent to the King of Tuscany the country of Piombino, which belonged to the King of Naples.

ART. 6. As this treaty has its origin in that concluded between the First Consul and his Catholic Majesty, by which the King cedes to France the possession of Louisiana, the contracting parties agree to carry into effect the articles of that treaty; and that, while the difficulties with regard to them are in process of arrangement, the present treaty shall not destroy the rights of either party.

ART. 7. And as the new house which is to be established in Tuscany is of the Spanish family, those States shall always be the property of Spain, and an infant of that family shall reign there in case of a failure of the succession of the King now placed on the throne, or of his children, if he should have any, in which event the children of the reigning house of Spain shall succeed.

ART. 8. The First Consul and his Catholic Majesty, in consideration of the renunciation of the reigning Duke of Parma in favor of his son, will determine upon some honorable indemnification for him, either in possessions or in an annuity.

ART. 9. The present treaty shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged within three weeks, otherwise it will, after that period, be of no value.

ARANJUEZ, April 7, 1802.

SIR: I have communicated to his Majesty the proposition which your excellency made in the name of your Government, in your official letter of the 24th of March last, respecting the cession of the two Floridas to the United States of America, by sale. His Majesty having been made well acquainted with every thing advanced by your excellency in support of that idea, has commanded me to inform you, in reply, that his Majesty rejoices in every opportunity of strengthening the bonds of friendship with the United States of America, but that the subject in question, being one of the utmost weight and importance, merits great circumspection before it can be determined.

With regard to the request made by you in the same official letter, that a mercantile agent of the United States should be permitted to reside at New Orleans, his Majesty does not accede to it, as it is prohibited by our laws of the Indies; and from the just consideration that, by making one example of that kind, the door would be opened for like demands on the part of other nations.

I embrace this opportunity to assure you of my distinguished consideration, &c.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

TO CHARLES PINCKNEY, Esq.,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

The above was translated by Robert Greenhow, translator of foreign languages to the Department of State of the United States, from a copy, in Spanish, of the original, existing in the archives of the Department of State at Madrid; which is authenticated by the certificate of Don Cefirino de Cevallos, the keeper of those archives, and by that of Don A. Calderon de la Barca, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Spain in the United States.

N.

From Charles Pinckney, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America at Madrid, to his Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos, Secretary of State of Spain.

ARANJUEZ, February 17, 1803.

I had the honor, last evening, to state to your excellency the nature of the information I had received from our Government, and their instructions respecting the conduct of the intendant of New Orleans, in prohibiting the deposit of American effects, stipulated by the treaty of 1795. I trust, from the statements then made, your excellency was fully impressed with the delicacy and pressing importance of the subject, and the sensibility and anxiety of our Government and citizens to have this order of the intendant immediately revoked, under the conviction that it was issued without the knowledge of his Majesty or his Government, on whose honorable and exact compliance with treaties they had the most perfect reliance. It was with particular pleasure, therefore, I received from your excellency the information that this order of the intendant had been issued by him without the knowledge of his Majesty or his Government, and that orders should be immediately sent to New Orleans, to the intendant and proper authorities there, to regulate the commerce and intercourse of the citizens of the United States in that port by the treaty of 1795, and to place the same on the footing it had been from the foundation of that treaty to the issuing of the intendant's order. Your excellency was pleased to add that you would transmit a duplicate of this order to the minister plenipotentiary of his Majesty in the United States, to be shown to their Government, and forwarded by your minister to New Orleans. I will, at the same time, thank your excellency to be so obliging as to favor me with a copy of the order, that I might also be enabled to transmit it by some safe and speedy opportunity. I had the honor, yesterday, to state to your excellency the anxiety of our Government on the subject of possessing the territory on the east side of the Mississippi. The importance of this acquisition to them, for the purposes of securing to the citizens of one half of the United States the certain means of exporting their products, has been so fully explained to your excellency, in my letter written in March last, and in subsequent conversations, that I need not, at this time, go again into the subject. Referring your excellency to them, I have now to say that the Government of the United States, from many circumstances, as well as from the conduct of the intendant, feel themselves every day more convinced of the necessity of their having a permanent establishment on the Mississippi, convenient for the purposes of navigation, and belonging solely to them. To obtain this, they have authorized me to say that, should his Majesty be now inclined to sell to the United States his possessions on the east side of the river Mississippi, or between that and the river Mobile, agreeably to the propositions enclosed, the United States will make to his Majesty, and I do now in their name make, the important offer of guaranteeing to him and his successors his dominions beyond the Mississippi. It is with his Majesty and his ministers to consider, for the reasons I had the honor to state in our conversation of the last evening, the immense importance of this offer to the Spanish crown, and to reflect how far it may be in the power of any other nation to make an offer so truly valuable and precious as this is to Spain—one that the United States would never have made, but from a conviction of the indispensable necessity of their possessing a suitable establishment on this river, and which this territory can alone furnish. The unshaken, and, indeed, unimpeached honor of the United States, in the exact performance of treaties and guarantees, and in all their public contracts and transactions, is so well known as certainly to convince his Majesty and his ministers that any stipulations on their part will be faithfully executed. Referring your excellency to our conversation the last evening, in which I opened to you many of the reasons for making this offer, I wish your excellency to submit them to his Majesty, and in a short time I will have the honor to see your excellency again, on my return from Madrid, for which place, for the present, I will thank your excellency to direct your letters for me.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CHARLES PINCKNEY.

Propositions made to Spain on the 17th of February, 1803, by Charles Pinckney, on the part of the United States.

1. The United States will purchase the possessions of his Catholic Majesty on the east side of the river Mississippi, for which they will pay _____ dollars.
2. They will purchase these possessions, for which they will pay _____ dollars; and, moreover, guaranty to his Majesty and his successors his possessions beyond the river Mississippi.
3. They will purchase the country between the rivers Mississippi and Mobile, belonging to his Majesty, and, also, places of deposit near the mouths of the other rivers passing from their territory through either of the Floridas, for which they will pay ——— dollars, or enter into other obligations, which may be thought equivalent to the acquirement.

4. If none of these propositions can be acceded to, they will then purchase certain tracts of country on the banks of the Mississippi and the other rivers passing from their territory into that of his Catholic Majesty, for which they will pay ——— dollars, or enter into other obligations which may be thought equivalent to the acquirement.

Translation of a letter from the Secretary of State of Spain to Charles Pinckney, Minister of the United States of America at Madrid.

PALACE, July 19, 1803.

To the Minister of the United States of America :

SIR : His Majesty the King having given orders to his minister near the United States of America to make known to that Government the absolute nullity of the proceedings of France in disposing of Louisiana, which she had formally and positively engaged not to sell, I now communicate the same to you, in order that you may submit it to your Government, which will thus receive it by distinct channels. At the same time, I must inform you, in reply to the assurance given me by you at our last conference that France had also ceded West Florida, that the said province never has at any time or by any title belonged to the French.

Protest of the Marquis de Casa Calvo, Commissioner of Spain, respecting the pretensions of the United States, addressed to M. Laussat, the Colonial Prefect of Louisiana, with the reply of the latter.

Translated by Robert Greenhow, translator of foreign languages to the Department of State of the United States, from copies taken from originals in the archives of the Department of State of Madrid ; which copies were authenticated by the certificates of Don Ceferino de Cevallos, keeper of the said archives, and of Don A. Calderon de la Barca, minister of Spain in the United States of America.

NEW ORLEANS, March 31, 1804.

To the Colonial Prefect and Commissioner of the French Republic :

I should be guilty of a great dereliction from my duty, and from the necessities imposed by the confidence of the King my master, when he gave me my commission, if, while you are preparing for your voyage, and terminating the operations in which I was also destined to bear a part, I should neglect to communicate to you, in the name of the King, that Spain cannot with indifference regard the exorbitant propositions which the United States are beginning to set forth, with regard to the limits, both to the east and the west, of the province of Louisiana. The limits on the east are established by solemn treaties, and for that very reason are absolutely unquestionable ; it however appears that France herself is supporting the establishment of those on the west, at the mouth of the river Bravo. I cannot, therefore, refrain from entering my most solemn protest against any operations or intentions of establishing the limits beyond the river Sabine, until his Majesty shall have resolved upon some measure with regard to the subject ; as such a proceeding would be prejudicial to the interests of Spain, and would tend to dismember a considerable portion of the internal provinces of Mexico, to the great damage of the dominions of his Majesty and of his subjects.

And in order that this may forever be public, I beseech you, sir, to inform your Government of it, in order that the limits may be settled truly, which now appear undetermined, and the operations of tracing them may be begun upon the bases already acknowledged by France when she formerly possessed the province of Louisiana.

May God preserve you many years.

THE MARQUIS DE CASA CALVO.

Reply to the foregoing Protest.

NEW ORLEANS, 12 of Germinal, year 12,

(2d of April, 1804.)

To the Marquis de Casa Calvo, Brigadier of the armies of Spain, and Commissioner of his Catholic Majesty :

SIR : I will faithfully submit to my Government the declaration, in the form of a protest, which you placed in my hands by your letter of the 10th of Germinal of the present year, (March 31, 1804,) respecting the limits which should be established for Louisiana, according to the treaty of restoration and of cession, in execution of which I here represent the French people, by commission from the First Consul. I have the honor to salute you, sir, with the greatest consideration.

LAUSSAT.

EMPLOYMENT OF BOYS IN THE VESSELS OF THE UNITED STATES.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

January 31, 1837.

Mr. Davis submitted the following report :

The Committee on Commerce have had under consideration a bill to encourage the employment of boys in the vessels of the United States, and report thereon as follows :

They are informed that the professed object of said bill is to increase the number of our seamen, by compelling ships which go on foreign voyages to take out as part of the crew a certain proportion of boys, who are to serve as apprentices to learn the art of seamanship.

In this it is alleged that this Government has an obvious interest, for, as a maritime Power, it must defend itself and its commerce against aggression upon the ocean.

It is said that every nation situated as we are consults its security, the safety of private property, and the honor of its flag, by encouraging in suitable ways and by proper inducements young persons to engage in sea service ; for the country must rely on the commercial marine for the support and efficiency of its navy.

This is one ground on which the fisheries are encouraged, and they are the greatest nursery of seamen.

While the measure before us may be admitted as having this tendency, it must not escape our observation that it is not for the interest of navigators to take boys to sea ; if it were, there would be no occasion to compel them to it.

On the contrary, it would be burdensome, and, as far as onerous, injurious to navigators, and tend to equalise their condition with that of foreigners,

The English entertain the opinion, and probably not without cause for it, that our seamen, as a class, are more efficient, able, intelligent navigators than theirs.

The proof of this is found in the fact that we sail our vessels with less numerical force, and actually make our voyages with greater despatch.

In the trade between the two countries we are upon a footing of equality, and it is from this superior seamanship that we retain such a large proportion of the freighting; for wages in England are not as high as in our ports.

We must therefore be cautious about loading navigation with new burdens, lest the profits of the business should not justify it.

On this point we have taken the opinions of several of the chambers of commerce, and we find them divided on this question.

It has not also escaped our observation that an opinion is prevalent that, in the large cities, the character of our seamen is deteriorating. We have proofs on this head tending to establish the affirmative of this proposition, and to establish the fact that we are either employing foreigners, or, for the want of proper moral supervision, our seamen are fast assimilating in character to foreigners.

Much concern has been felt by observing men on this head; for, when we cease to be superior, then their navigating interest will triumph, for they give less wages than we.

Measures to elevate and preserve the character and the number of our seamen must at all times command considerable attention; and this measure would make a strong appeal for an experiment, if it did not evidently bring with it burdens which it is feared ought not to be laid upon a class of men struggling with a gigantic competitor.

The committee have, therefore, under all the circumstances, come to the conclusion that the measure is inexpedient for the present, upon the information before them, and therefore recommend the indefinite postponement of the bill. Further and better information may lead to a change of opinion.

The committee may also add that they find no inconsiderable difficulty in securing, by suitable provisions, the rights of boys sent to sea as apprentices. On a violation of the contract, or a failure on the part of the master to observe his duties and obligations, the boy ought to be discharged; but it is not easy, in a large portion of our ports, to devise a satisfactory method of doing it.

PATENT OFFICE.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 9, 1837.

Mr. Ruggles made the following report:

The special committee appointed to examine and report the extent of the loss sustained by the burning of the Patent Office, and to consider whether any and what measures ought to be adopted to repair the loss, and to establish such evidences of property in patented inventions as the destruction of the records and drawings may have rendered necessary for its security, submit the following report:

In examining the subject referred to them, the committee have been deeply impressed with the loss the country has sustained in the destruction, by the fire of the 15th December, of the records, originals, drawings, models, &c., belonging to the Patent Office. They not only embraced the whole history of American invention for nearly half a century, but were the muniments of property of vast amount, secured by law to a great number of individuals, both citizens and foreigners, the protection and security of which must now become seriously difficult and precarious.

Every thing belonging to the office was destroyed—nothing was saved. There were one hundred and sixty-eight large folio volumes of records, and twenty-six large portfolios, containing nine thousand drawings, many of which were beautifully executed and very valuable; there were also all the original descriptions and specifications of inventions, in all about ten thousand, besides caveats and many other documents and papers.

There were also two hundred and thirty volumes of books belonging to the Patent Office library, the cost of which was $1,000. Some of these were procured prior to the passage of the act of July 4, 1836, making an appropriation of $1,500 for procuring a library of scientific works. Others were procured subsequently, for which $320 of that appropriation was expended.

The model-cases, press and seals, desks, book-cases, and other furniture and effects belonging to the office, were estimated at $6,600.

The foregoing are more particularly described in schedules A, B, and C, annexed to a letter from the Commissioner of Patents, in reply to inquiries made by the committee, which accompanies this report.

The Patent Office contained also the largest and most interesting collection of models in the world. It was an object of just pride to every American able to appreciate its value as an item in the estimate of national character, or the advantages and benefits derivable from high improvement in the useful arts—a pride which must now stand rebuked by the improvidence which exposed so many memoirs and evidences of the superiority of American genius to the destruction which has overtaken them.

The number of models was about seven thousand. Many of them displayed great talent, ingenuity, and mechanical science. The American inventions pertaining to the spinning of cotton and wool, and the manufacture of fabrics, in many respects exceed those of any other nation, and reduced so much the expense of manufacture, that the British manufacturers were reluctantly obliged, at the expense of a little national pride, to lay aside their own machinery and adopt our improvements, to prevent our underselling them, even in their home market. In this department were the inventions of Brown, Thorpe, Darforth, Couillard, Calvert, and some others. The beautiful operative model of Wilkinson's machine for manufacturing weavers' reeds by one operation was considered one of the most ingenious mechanical combinations ever invented. Of this character was Whittemore's celebrated machine for making wool cards. There were several models of valuable improvements in shearing and napping cloth, patented to Swift, Stowell, Dewey, Parsons, Daniels, and others.

In another department were several models of machines for manufacturing cut and wrought nails. The machinery for this purpose, which has reduced so much the price of that important article, was of purely American origin, and was invented by Briggs, Perkins, Reed, Odiorne, and several others.

The models of improvements in grist-mills, saw-mills, water-wheels, &c., were numerous.

The application of steam power to the driving of all kinds of machinery, for propelling boats, locomotives, mills, and factories, has brought out a great number of American inventions and improvements, displaying a degree of talent, ingenuity, and science, highly creditable to our country. Some of the models in this department were very valuable. America claims the honor (contested, indeed, by England) of the first successful attempt to apply the power of steam to the propelling of vessels. The name of Fulton is associated with one of the noblest efforts of genius and science. It has often been regretted that no model was preserved of his steamboat, which was the first to demonstrate the practicability of making steam subservient to the purposes of useful navigation. There was, however, deposited in the Patent Office a volume of drawings, elegantly executed by his own hand, delineating the various parts of the machinery he employed, and embracing three beautiful representations of his steamer, making its first triumphant struggle against the opposing current of the Hudson. The steamer was represented passing through the Highlands, and at two or three other interesting points on the river, with a beautiful sketching of the surrounding scenery, smiling as it were at the victory which science and art had at last achieved over the power of the winds and the waters, and at the opening era of steam navigation, the benefits of which have since been so widely diffused. It contained, also, an account of his experiments on the resistance of fluids, and various estimates of the power required to propel vessels of various tonnage and form through the water, at a greater or less speed. This volume, which should have been preserved among our choicest archives, shared the fate of every thing else in the office. What sum would be too great to be expended in replacing it!

The department of agriculture contained a great number of models of highly useful improvements in the implements of husbandry. The number of inventions which had for their object the advancement of the agricultural interests was about fifteen hundred; those which pertained to navigation were little short of a thousand. The inventions and improvements in factory machinery, and in the various manufactures, were upwards of two thousand. In the common mechanical trades there were as many more. It were vain to attempt to enumerate or classify them within the reasonable space of a report of committee. There was no art or pursuit to which ingenuity and invention had not lent their aid.

That this great national repository should have received so little consideration heretofore as to be left so long exposed to conflagration, which has at last swept every vestige of it from existence, cannot be too deeply deplored. But the reproach does not rest at the door of the present Congress. The act passed at its first session, reorganizing the office, containing many important provisions for its management, and the appropriation for erecting a fire-proof building, for the accommodation and preservation of the records, models, &c., which is now under construction, attest the interest inspired and the attention devoted to it, though, unfortunately, too late to rescue it from destruction.

That the benefit of such an institution is limited to the mechanic arts and manufactures, or that it is confined to any particular section of the Union, is an erroneous idea. Its influence is felt in every branch of national industry, and no one section of the country can justly be said to derive less advantage from it than another. The idea is equally erroneous that such institutions are established for the benefit of patentees only. The advancement of great national interests is the first object of the patent laws of all nations where they exist. The specifications, models, and drawings, are required, that, after the patent term shall have expired, the public may have the benefit of a disclosure of the invention, so full and intelligible that any one can apply its principles to practical use, or make them the foundation of further improvements.

It is a still more erroneous idea that no drawings or models of new inventions are of use to the public, unless the machinery they represent is susceptible of a practical application to the use designed. Mechanical science, like all others, is matured and perfected by degrees, and by calling to its aid the investigations and ingenuity of various minds. Most inventions are but the foundation of progressive improvements. It is necessary to know what has been done, in order to know what remains to be accomplished. Every age avails itself of the experience and discoveries of that which has preceded it; were it otherwise, knowledge would be stationary, and every generation, instead of being wiser than others gone by, would be employed in learning over again what had been acquired before. The drawings and models of even those inventions which are imperfect, or incapable of producing the desired effect, serve to show how far others have progressed, and either furnish hints for the full accomplishment of the design, or as beacons to enable others to avoid fruitless labor and expense. Whoever would attempt to improve the arts must begin where others have left off: hence, the model-rooms of the Patent Office were constantly visited by men of genius and science from all sections of the country, and from Europe, where they were able at once to discover how far American invention had gone, and where they frequently derived important hints from inventions and contrivances of apparently but little value.

They would seem, also, to be almost indispensable, in deciding upon new applications for patents, to enable the proper officers to judge of the originality of the invention, and to prevent the issuing of interfering patents. It often requires a very close examination of the principles of a machine, and a careful comparison of models and drawings, to discover how far they interfere with previous inventions. The provision interdicting the granting of patents for what is not new and original is the most valuable feature of the act of July last. But it will be impossible for the Commissioner to administer the law in that particular, according to its intent, without models and drawings of inventions previously patented. The consequence would be, in effect, the restoration of a great portion of the evils of the former system, in multiplying conflicting rights, leading to much perplexity and expensive litigation. Much of the ground travelled over in the last forty years would have to be travelled over again before the point could be reached at which we had arrived prior to the late conflagration.

The committee, therefore, believe that it is important to the interest of the country, as well as to the security of individual rights, that measures be immediately adopted to replace, as far as practicable, the records, drawings, and models, which have been destroyed. After much inquiry and consideration, the committee are satisfied that, notwithstanding the apprehensions and anxiety so generally entertained, a restoration is practicable to a very gratifying extent. The first step must be to procure, for the purpose of being copied and recorded anew, the original patents. In most instances, descriptions and specifications of the inventions, and, in perhaps a sixth or eighth part of the cases, drawings also, have been annexed to the patents when granted. Drawings have been attached only when referred to in the specifications. The whole number of patents is a little upwards of ten thousand. It is believed that from six to seven thousand may be obtained for record. Many of the deficient drawings may be obtained from patentees, or may be supplied by the assistance of those whose familiar knowledge of the inventions will enable them, aided by the specifications, to delineate them with much accuracy. Many copies heretofore certified from the record, to be used as evidence in the courts, will supply others.

Of the models, such as were trifling and unimportant, containing no new principle or combination of mechanism, and not useful for any of the purposes before alluded to, it will not be necessary to replace. The whole number of models was about seven thousand. It is the opinion of the Commissioner, and others most conversant with the subject, that three thousand of the most important can be replaced, which will form a very interesting and valuable collection, less numerous, indeed, but more select, and scarcely less useful, than that which has been destroyed. Some of these would be replaced by voluntary contributions. But the greatest portion of them, even of those whose restoration would be most desirable, the committee are satisfied, can only be had by means in the hands of the Government. If it were in the power of the Government to compel patentees to replace the models and drawings lost by its improvidence, it would be an onerous and unjust tax upon those who, by their ingenuity, and at their own expense, built up an institution which, in its connexion with manufactures, with agriculture, and even commerce itself, has done much to advance the prosperity of the country. They have paid into the Treasury $156,907 73 more than has been required to meet the expenses of the office, including the salaries of the officers employed in it; and the committee cannot hesitate in recommending the appropriation of that balance, to carry into effect the provisions of the bill which is herewith submitted.

The sentiment is not an uncommon one, that the tax upon patents is both unwise in policy and unjust in principle. Inventors are public benefactors, contributing to the promotion and improvement of all branches of national industry, and, in most instances, without any adequate remuneration. Who has done more to enrich the South, nay, indirectly, the whole country, than Whitney? And what was his reward? Let the South answer. Evans and Fulton, with genius and talents never, while they lived, appreciated to their worth, died overwhelmed by embarrassments. Whittemore, it is true, was more fortunate; but it was said that he availed himself of the mechanical genius of another, who lived and died in poverty and obscurity.

It has not been the policy of our Government to draw a revenue from patentees. The duty imposed was intended only to meet the ordinary expenses of issuing patents. Many believe that even that should not be exacted. It is levying a contribution upon science and ingenuity, which cost the nation nothing, while they confer upon it important benefits.

The measures to be adopted in selecting and obtaining the models, and many of the drawings, are matters of detail, involving such a variety of circumstances and considerations, that is impossible to make provision for them by law. That properly belongs and should be intrusted to a temporary board of commissioners. The sum required to replace the three thousand models, which would include all whose preservation would be most desirable, is estimated by the Commissioner at $100,000. The expense of transcribing and recording descriptions, specifications, drawings, and assignments, is estimated at $53,000. A judicious and economical expenditure of these sums, it is believed, will restore the records and models to the full extent contemplated by the provisions of the bill submitted. By the statement from the Treasury Department, (marked E,) it appears that the balance of the patent fund on the 31st December last was $156,907 73, including moneys received for patents and copies prior to the act of July, 1836, which, though not expressly embraced by the terms of that act, properly belong to that fund. This balance will cover the expenditures above proposed of $153,000, together with $3,100 for record books, desks, and other office furniture, as per estimate D, and leave a balance of $807 73.

With such a restoration, and the addition of the specimens of fabrics and manufactures of various kinds which are in preparation in a number of the manufactories and workshops of the country, to be deposited in rooms in the new building, pursuant to the act of July last, we shall soon have less reason than is now apprehended throughout the country to deplore the destruction of this great national repository. In two or three years the number of models will be scarcely less, and their character and value in the aggregate greatly improved.

It appears by the Commissioner that an additional examining clerk and also another copying clerk are necessary to keep up the increasing business of the office. The new duties assigned to the examining clerk make it a very responsible and laborious office. It is his business to make himself fully acquainted with the principles of the invention for which a patent is sought, and to make a thorough investigation of all that has been before known or invented, either in Europe or America, on the particular subject presented for his examination. He must ascertain how far the invention interferes, in any of its parts, with other previous inventions or things previously in use. He must point out and describe the extent of such collision and interference, that the applicant may have the benefit of the information in so shaping or restricting his claim of originality as not to trespass upon the rights of others. The applicant should also be referred to the sources of this information, that he may be able to satisfy himself on the particular points of interference. This frequently leads to a lengthy correspondence, before the applicant can be persuaded that his invention, or some rejected part of it, is not new. He often employs skilful and persevering counsel to urge and enforce by argument new views of the principles of his invention, who sometimes brings to his aid much mechanical astuteness. The examiner must also see that the specification accords with the drawing, and that the model is in conformity with both.

An efficient and just discharge of these duties, it is obvious, requires extensive scientific attainments, and a general knowledge of the arts, manufactures, and the mechanism used in every branch of business in which improvements are sought to be patented, and of the principles embraced in the ten thousand inventions patented in the United States, and of the thirty thousand patented in Europe. He must, moreover, possess a familiar knowledge of the statute and common law on the subject, and the judicial decisions, both in England and our own country, in patent cases. This service is important, as it is often difficult and laborious. Here is the first check upon attempts to palm off old inventions for new, or to interfere with the rights of others previously acquired. This is also the source whence the honest and meritorious inventor may look for aid and direction in so framing his specification as that he may be able to sustain his patent when issued, and find security and protection against expensive and fruitless litigation.

Suitable qualifications for these duties are rare, and cannot be obtained without such compensation as they readily command in other employment. It will undoubtedly be wise in the Government to affix such salary to this office as will secure the best talent and qualifications. Although an appeal is allowed by law, yet, if a high character is given to it, this will be the best, as it is the most appropriate tribunal for judging of these subjects; and its decisions commanding respect and confidence, there will be but little inclination to take exceptions to its judgment. Thus will be cut off a fruitful source of lawsuits, and our court calendars will cease to be crowded with cases arising out of the interfering rights of patentees. Meritorious inventors will be secure in their rights, and the public relieved from imposition and embarrassment. These are among the first of the objects and merits of the act of last session. It appears that about one third of all the specifications are found, on examination, to contain no new principle, and that three fourths of the residue are either too broad in their claims of originality, or are otherwise irregular or defective, and are required to be set right at the office, or sent back by the Commissioner for correction.

Under existing circumstances, without written, pictorial, or model record of any kind, it is apparent that the business of the office must either stand still, or proceed under very great embarrassment, which can be relieved only by the early action of Congress on the subject.

A bill is herewith submitted.

A bill in addition to the act to promote the progress of science and useful arts.

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person who may be in possession of, or in any way interested in, any patent for an invention, discovery, or improvement, issued prior to the fifteenth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, or in an assignment of any patent, or interest therein, executed and recorded prior to the said fifteenth day of December, may, without charge, on presentation or transmission thereof to the Commissioner of Patents, have the same recorded anew in the Patent Office, together with the descriptions, specifications of claim, and drawings annexed or belonging to the same; and it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to cause the same, or any authenticated copy of the original record, specification, or drawing, which he may obtain, to be transcribed and copied into books of record, to be kept for that purpose. And wherever a drawing was not originally annexed to the patent, and referred to in the specification, any drawing produced as a delineation of the invention, being verified by oath in such manner as the Commissioner shall require, may be transmitted and copied as aforesaid, together with the certificate of the oath; or such drawings may be made in the office, under the direction of the Commissioner, in conformity with the specification. And it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to take such measures as may be advised and determined by the board of commissioners provided for in the fourth section of this act, to obtain the patents, specifications, and copies aforesaid, for the purpose of being so transcribed and recorded.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That copies of such record and drawings, certified by the Commissioner, or, in his absence, by the chief clerk, shall be prima facie evidence of the particulars of the invention and of the patent granted therefor, in any judicial court of the United States, in all cases where copies of the original record or specification and drawings would be evidence, without proof of the loss of such originals. And no patent issued prior to the aforesaid fifteenth day of December shall, after the first day of June next, be received in evidence in any of the said courts, in behalf of the patentee or other person who shall be in possession of the same, unless it shall have been so recorded anew, and a drawing of the invention, if separate from the patent, verified as aforesaid, deposited in the Patent Office; nor shall any written assignment of any such patent, executed and recorded prior to the said fifteenth day of December, be received in evidence, in any of the said courts, in behalf of the assignee or other person in possession thereof, until it shall have been so recorded anew.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, whenever it shall appear to the Commissioner that any patent was destroyed by the burning of the Patent Office building on the aforesaid fifteenth day of December, it shall be his duty, on application therefor by the patentee or other person interested therein, to issue a new patent for the same invention or discovery, bearing the date of the original patent, with his certificate thereon that it was made and issued pursuant to the provisions of the third section of this act, and shall enter the same of record: Provided, however, That, before such patent shall be issued, the applicant therefor shall deposit in the Patent Office a duplicate, as near as may be, of the original model, drawings, and description, with specification of the invention or discovery, verified by oath, as shall be required by the Commissioner. And such patent, and copies of such drawings and descriptions, duly certified, shall be admissible as evidence in any judicial court of the United States, and shall protect the rights of the patentee, his administrators, heirs, and assigns, to the extent only in which they would have been protected by the original patent and specification.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to procure a duplicate of such of the models destroyed by fire on the aforesaid fifteenth day of December as were most valuable and interesting, and whose preservation would be important to the public; and such as would be necessary to facilitate the just discharge of the duties imposed by law on the Commissioner in issuing patents, and to protect the rights of the public and of patentees in patented inventions and improvements: Provided, That a duplicate of such models may be obtained at a reasonable expense: And provided, also, That the whole amount of expenditure for this purpose shall not exceed the sum of one hundred thousand dollars. And there shall be a temporary board of commissioners, to be composed of the Commissioner of the Patent Office and two other persons, to be appointed by the President, whose duty it shall be to consider and determine upon the best and most judicious mode of obtaining models of suitable construction; and, also, to consider and determine what models may be procured in pursuance of, and in accordance with, the provisions and limitations in this section contained. And said commissioners may make and establish all such regulations, terms, and conditions, not inconsistent with law, as in their opinion may be proper and necessary to carry the provisions of this section into effect according to its true intent.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That whenever a patent shall be returned for correction and reissue under the thirteenth section of the act to which this is additional, and the patentee shall desire several patents to be issued for distinct and separate parts of the thing patented, he shall first pay, in manner and in addition to the sum provided by that act, the sum of thirty dollars for each additional patent so to be issued: Provided, however, That no patent made prior to the aforesaid fifteenth day of December shall be corrected and reissued until a duplicate of the model and drawing of the thing, as originally invented, verified by oath, as shall be required by the Commissioner, shall be deposited in the Patent Office.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That any patent hereafter to be issued may be made and issued to the assignee or assignees of the inventor or discoverer, the assignment thereof being first entered of record, and the application therefor being duly made, and the specification duly sworn to by the inventor. And in all cases hereafter, the applicant for a patent shall be held to furnish duplicate drawings, one of which to be deposited in the office, and the other to be annexed to the patent, and considered a part of the specification.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner is hereby authorized and empowered to appoint agents in not exceeding twenty of the principal cities or towns in the United States, as may best accommodate the different sections of the country, for the purpose of receiving and forwarding to the Patent Office all such models, specimens of ingredients, and manufactures, as shall be intended to be patented or deposited therein; the transportation of the same to be chargeable to the patent fund.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That, instead of one examining clerk, as provided by the second section of the act to which this is additional, there shall be appointed, in manner therein provided, two examining clerks, each to receive an annual salary of _____ dollars; and also an additional copying clerk, at an annual salary of _____ dollars. And the Commissioner is also authorized to employ, from time to time, as many temporary clerks as may be necessary to execute the copying and draughting required by the first section of this act, who shall receive not exceeding _____ cents for every page of one hundred words, and for drawing such reasonable compensation as shall be agreed upon or prescribed by the Commissioner.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That, whenever the application of any foreigner for a patent shall be rejected and withdrawn, for want of novelty in the invention, pursuant to the seventh section of the act to which this is additional, the certificate thereof of the Commissioner shall be a sufficient warrant to the Treasurer to pay back to such applicant two thirds of the duty he shall have paid into the Treasury on account of such application.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That all moneys paid into the Treasury of the United States, for patents and for fees for copies furnished by the Superintendent of the Patent Office, prior to the passage of the act to which this is additional, shall be carried to the credit of the patent fund created by said act; and the moneys constituting said fund shall be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the payment of the salaries of the officers and clerks provided for by said act, and all other expenses of the Patent Office, including all the expenditures provided for by this act, and also for such other purposes as are or may be hereafter specially provided for by law. And the Commissioner is hereby authorized to draw upon said fund, from time to time, for such sums as shall be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act; governed, however, by the several limitations herein contained. And it shall be his duty to lay before Congress in the month of January, annually, a detailed statement of the expenditures and payments by him made from said fund.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
January 7, 1837.

SIR: In compliance with your request, I have the honor, herewith, to transmit to you a statement of the receipts from patents, and expenditures for that branch of the public business, brought down to the 31st ultimo.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. JOHN RUGGLES,

PATENT OFFICE, December, 28, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th instant, containing several inquiries, and hasten to reply.

Question 1. "Did any of the records of the office, or original specifications, drawings, or models, belonging thereto, survive the recent conflagration?"

Answer. The rapidity of the conflagration prevented all access to the office, and, consequently, there is a total loss of models, drawings, records, and, indeed, papers of every kind.

2. "How many volumes of records and other official documents and papers, and how many portfolios of drawings, were destroyed? Please state the number of each description or class of records, documents, and papers."

Answer. There were 168 volumes of records; these are particularly described in schedule A, annexed; and there were 26 portfolios, containing 9,000 drawings.

3. "What number of volumes were there belonging to the library of the office, and what their cost or value? Please furnish a schedule of them. Can they be replaced?"

Answer. The number of volumes in the library were about 230, and cost $1,000. These can all be replaced. For inventory, see schedule B. annexed.

4. "What was the whole number of models destroyed, and what was the probable expense of their construction; that of the most expensive and valuable, and the average of all?"

Answer. The whole number is about 6,000 patented and 1,000 unpatented. It is impossible to make an approximate estimate of the original cost of these models, on account of the great expense patentees have, in most instances, incurred in constructing and reconstructing, and making various experiments and alterations.

5. "Were there any, and how many, new unpatented models in the office, with applications for patents, on which patents had not been issued?"

Answer. There were 250 which had been received under the new law, of which about 100 would have been patented and 150 rejected for want of novelty.

6. "Were there any and how many patents in the office returned, for reissue, under the 13th section of the patent law, on which reissues had not been made?"

Answer. Five patents.

7. "What other effects belonging to the office were lost by the fire?"

Answer. All the furniture, model-cases, stationery, and fuel, per schedule C.

8. "What is your opinion of the practicability of obtaining faithful duplicates of the more valuable and interesting models destroyed, and what portion of those lost would be necessary or desirable to exhibit the progress and rising gradations of mechanical science in this country, or be important and useful in facilitating the discharge of the duties imposed by law upon the officer and other tribunals appointed to decide the various questions of novelty in inventions?"

Answer. A faithful duplicate of most of the important models that were destroyed can, it is believed, be obtained. Three thousand models of select and valuable inventions would go far to restore that department of the office to a condition that would be both gratifying and useful.

The great importance of a set of models that exhibit the gradual progress and state of the useful arts is self-evident. It is due to the inventor and to science. Among the old models destroyed many were not, and never would be, practically useful; but, notwithstanding this, it is important that some of them should be restored. They exhibited the progress of inventions; they often furnished the groundwork of important improvements. Fulton's improvements on the steamboat is a strong illustration. His improvements were based upon inventions that had been abandoned as utterly useless. Models are also useful as beacons to subsequent inventors. Many individuals have been saved years of labor and great expense by a few minutes' examination in the Patent Office. But another great benefit of these models is to enable the office to decide upon the novelty or originality of inventions.

Inventors are exceedingly tenacious, and will not yield to corrections unless furnished with substantial testimony. The models are important to applicants when examining the probability of success before filing their papers for a patent. Without models, no information can be had except by a correspondence extremely onerous and expensive to Government. I may add, that, such is the importance of models that, without a sufficient number to exhibit a connected series of inventions, it seems utterly impossible to execute the duties of Commissioner as the law requires.

"9. What would be the average expense of their construction?"

Answer. The average expense of 3,000 models may be estimated at from 30 to 40 dollars each.

10. "Generally, what are the evils apprehended from the loss of the models and records, and what remedy does your experience in the office and knowledge of its concerns suggest as practicable and appropriate?"

Answer. This calamity, so sudden and extensive, seems almost to justify despair. The Patent Office had been reorganized, the papers and models classified anew, and a library partly collected; all is gone, and not a vestige remains. My anxiety to save the records and drawings induced me to make several efforts to force my way through the fire to reach the door of the Patent Office, but in vain.

For a short time I doubted what could be done to repair the loss. I am happy to say that I believe personal effort, aided by the fostering hand of Government, can do much, and that the remedy will be coextensive with the means used. Permit me to remark that few persons can realize the anxiety, the suffering and litigation, that may arise from this calamity. The hopes of thousands who have spent their all in advancing the arts of our country depend on the continued protection of the patent law.

The claims of the patentees are great, and not less important than just. Already have they paid into the Treasury $160,000 over and above all expenses attending the Patent Office since its first organization; and hence it cannot be doubted that the means will be granted to restore, as far as possible, the losses now sustained. What, then, can be done? The evidence that is lost should be immediately supplied. The number of patents granted are about ten thousand; most of these can be obtained and re-recorded again. In all cases where duplicate drawings were furnished, one will accompany the patent, and can be copied. The deficiency of important drawings (if lost by the patentee) will be remedied in part by procuring some of the numerous copies furnished by the office, during the last forty years, for examination or litigation. Besides, the valuable inventions here have been, some of them, patented in Europe, and are found in foreign journals. The journals of our own country contain also many patents. A complete list of all patents issued can be procured. Interest will compel patentees and assignees to send in their patents for record in cases where the patent has not expired, and as those who have unexpired patents possess many expired ones, upon which improvements are made, it is believed 6,000 patents can be procured without much delay. If a law was passed requiring patents and assignments, hereafter introduced as evidence, to be recorded subsequent to the 15th December, 1836, this would secure a ready record of unexpired patents. To induce patentees to send in their original papers, the Government must give assurance that the same shall be safely kept and transcribed and returned without delay. To inspire this confidence in patentees, I have, through the kindness of the city authorities, obtained accommodations in the city hall, where fire-proof rooms are furnished both for the office and models. I rejoice to say no danger can be apprehended here from fire. One inconvenience complained of by patentees is the trouble and expense of transporting their models from distant parts of the country to Washington. To obviate this, I would respectfully suggest the expediency of receiving the models at certain depots in each State, to be forwarded at the expense of the Government. If Government would defray this expense of transportation, and provide the means of constructing such as are deemed absolutely necessary, I feel confident a more complete if not so extensive a collection can, within a few years, be had again.

Many manufacturers were, prior to the late fire, preparing to send to the new Patent Office fabrics and manufactures receivable under the new law, and for which room is to be provided in the new building. I may safely add, that such is the gratification of manufacturers and inventors at the facilities afforded by the new patent law for a display of their ingenuity, that the new building, with what may be replaced, will not only be filled immediately, but will surpass any thing of the kind in Europe. This calamity, I have remarked, can be chiefly repaired by exertion; and I ardently hope that Government will appropriate the balance due the patent fund, and more, if necessary, to accomplish this object. The number of recording clerks will require the appointment of a few temporary clerks to compare the records, when made, with the original. An appropriation will be immediately needed to restore the loss. If this appropriation is made, patentees will be stimulated to high effort, and those in the office will be cheered in their struggle with surrounding difficulties. An appeal, if necessary, might be made to the pride of the nation. American inventors have proved to the world that the arts and sciences can flourish in free Governments. The names of Fulton, Whitney, Whittemore, and many others, will be held in grateful remembrance; and since the greatest inventions, however useful to the world, have been of little benefit to the inventors themselves, it is due to their memory, as citizens, to exhibit the efforts they made to advance the arts. Many of the most valuable improvements in labor-saving machinery have been copied in Europe from the United States. No foreigner withholds his surprise at the improvements and progress of the arts, as exhibited in the Patent Office.

Had not the patentees equitably a surplus of $160,000? If our country was oppressed with debt, even then a small grant of land, or its equivalent in scrip, would repair the loss. Can there be an American citizen to object to an adequate appropriation for this high purpose?

11. "What alterations, if any, has your experience as Commissioner suggested in the provisions of the act of July, 1836, regulating and reorganizing the Patent Office?"

Answer. So far as my experience extends, I hesitate not to say that the patent law is generally approved, and highly beneficial. It is equally advantageous to the public and the patentee. The former are defended from imposition, while the latter enjoy higher protection. Before the late law there was security for neither. The Patent Office only examined names and dates, and granted all applications presented in proper form. Of course, duplicates and triplicates were issued for the same inventions. The rights of parties were referred to the legal tribunals, and in the mean time spurious claims were selling throughout the United States.

The traffic in spurious patents will, it is hoped, be greatly lessened, and litigation, with her attending evils, be also diminished. Since the reorganization of the Patent Office in July, there have been presented about four hundred applications; ninety-five patents only have been issued; one hundred of the cases had not been examined. Some cases were rejected, others were returned for correction and alteration.

From past examinations, I think about one third of the applications will be rejected, and three fourths of those finally granted will be materially altered, in consequence of being found, on examination, to claim more than is original, and thus come in collision with the rights of others. Sixty caveats have been entered, and the number will increase as soon as the law is more generally understood.

A doubt was entertained by the Commissioner of Patents whether, on the surrender of an old patent, more than one new patent could be reissued. The Attorney General has decided that several patents may be granted on a single patent surrendered. To guard against any inducement to defraud the revenue, each patent granted, (if more than one,) on a surrender, might be taxed thirty dollars.

It is respectfully suggested whether it would not be well to authorize the repayment to foreigners of two thirds of the patent fee required of them when a patent is desired, for want of originality, as in the case of citizens.

The number of foreign applications is increasing. The new law was passed the last day of the session, and no other appropriation has been made to meet the expenses of the office, except the general provision of the law making the patent fund chargeable with all the salaries and other expenses. The appropriation under the old law could not be drawn, since all expenses accruing were chargeable to the new fund. The force in the office has been found insufficient to keep up the current business. I apprehend it was the design of the committee who reported the bill to increase the force in the office, but this was not done; and while the duties of the office have been greatly enlarged, no additional help has been allowed. Permit me to say that the current business of the office was, with some extra assistance, all brought up at the time of the fire, with the exception of the files on the examiner's desk, and that the receipts of the Patent Office since July have exceeded, by 7,000 dollars, all expenses since that period.

I would respectfully recommend the appointment of one additional clerk, and, also, another examiner. This office of examiner is a responsible station. No one can perform these duties without skill and experience. The duties of examiner must be great. Each application must be compared with caveats on file; with pending applications; with patents, models, and drawings, expired and unexpired; and, also, with foreign works on the matter of inquiry. All this must be done to ascertain the novelty in the application. After this, the specifications, drawings, and models, must be examined, and made conformable to the law. Some specifications are very intricate and lengthy. A specification was nearly completed, when the fire broke out, which contained sixty pages of parchment. In a late petition for a patent for a rotary engine, three caveats were found interferences; and each caveat, in its general principle, interfered with patents granted in this country, and also in Europe. A tedious examination was necessary to determine the novelty and priority. In this examination, many volumes (some in foreign languages) were referred to, and, although each applicant will be compelled to narrow his claims, yet each may have sufficient merit for a patent.

It is certainly desirable that the examinations should be so carefully made as to give satisfaction to the applicants and to the public. An appeal is allowed from the decision of the Commissioner; but this has never yet been claimed. Another examiner will give additional satisfaction, and greater despatch. One hundred cases remained on the files of the examiner at the time of the fire, and were of course consumed. It may be remarked that, if the duties of examiner are confined to a single individual, his sickness or absence must suspend the operations of the office.

I will only add, this is certainly the favorable moment to make an effort to repair the loss. Interest, sympathy, and patriotism, will unite. Justice demands all the reparation that can be made. Government has received from industry and ingenuity their choicest tribute. She confided the valuable repository to a place of little security. I have mourned, in common with others, at the ruins; but candor compels me to say that, without much help, I can do nothing to repair the loss. I leave, therefore, with the National Legislature, the importunities of those I am compelled to hear, but which I have not the power to relieve.

With the greatest respect, I have the honor to be, &c.

Chairman, &c., Senate.

A.

Schedule of records and papers burnt in the Patent Office.

Sixty volumes records of specifications, large folio books, from 500 to 600 pages.
Seven volumes of records of assignments.
Six volumes entry books for patents issued.
Thirty-three volumes of letters filed.
Thirty-nine volumes of letters copied.
All pending applications for patents, as near as can be ascertained, 500.
About 9,000 original specifications in files.
One caveat book.
One book of pending applications.
One note book of examinations.
Five classification books.
One fee book.
One ledger.
One journal.
One day book.
One check book.
Three volumes heads of patents.
Four volumes list of models.
One volume entries under new law.
Twenty-six portfolios for drawings.

BURNING OF THE POST OFFICE BUILDING.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
March, 2, 1837.

Mr. Knight made the following report :

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate instructing them to inquire into the cause of the destruction by fire of the building in which was the General Post Office, the City Post Office, and the Patent Office, report :

That the committee commenced the inquiry by addressing letters to the Postmaster General, the City Postmaster, and the Superintendent of the Patent Office, from each of whom answers were received, and are herunto annexed. We further proceeded by examining several persons who were first at the place of conflagration, but had not progressed far before it was ascertained we were following in the track of the committee of the House of Representatives, and that all the persons we had examined, or were about to examine, had already been examined, and their depositions taken, by the committee of the House. And believing that no information would be elicited which would not come to the knowledge of Congress through that committee, we therefore concluded it would not shed any light on the subject by proceeding further with the examination of those persons. But to suspend the investigation, and wait the development of some new fact or discovery of some other person possessing some knowledge or information of the matter referred to the committee, would better accomplish the object required by the resolution. But no such development or discovery having come to the knowledge of the committee, we therefore submit the statements of the Postmaster General, the City Postmaster, the Superintendent of the Patent Office, and, also, of the honorable Mr. Ruggles, of the Senate, James Summers, Samuel Crown, Henry Bishop, sen., and Cornelius Cox, as containing all the information obtained by the committee concerning the object of the inquiry aforesaid ; all of which are appended to and make a part of this report.

The committee cannot forbear remarking that the practice of placing ashes in and near the wood, coal, and other combustibles appertinent to the public offices, cannot be too strongly reprehended, and in their opinion such practice should be discontinued and abolished.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
January 3, 1837.

SIR: In compliance with the request contained in your letter of the 20th ultimo, I proceed to give you all the information in my possession in relation to the late destruction of the Post Office building by fire.

My residence is on the east side of Seventh street, nearly opposite the end of the Post Office building lately occupied by the Patent Office and City Post Office, and but a few rods distant. I left the Department soon after dark on the evening of the 14th ultimo, and retired early to bed, being quite indisposed. Between the hours of 3 and 4 o'clock on the morning of the 15th, the cry of fire was heard. Still being very unwell, I requested one of my family to look out and inform me where the fire was, and learnt that no appearance of fire was visible, either from the east or west windows of my dwelling. The cry of fire was repeated at intervals, and in a few minutes Mr. Laurenson, a clerk in the Auditor's office, rapped at my door, and stated that the Post Office was on fire. I instantly left my bed, and, looking out a front window, saw no signs of fire on any part of the building, the east end being in full view. I dressed, and, on going out, observed smoke issuing from the eastern door. Passing round to the front, I observed smoke issuing also from the cracks in the windows of the principal room of the City Post Office, and perceived a light over the front door, evidently produced by the flame within. Not observing a single person, and having no means to extinguish a fire so much advanced in the combustible matter with which the City Post Office was filled, I thought it my duty to proceed to save the books of the General Post Office. I entered the passage at the west end of the building, and saw a light over the door which separated the City Post Office from the passage of the Post Office Department, through the cracks of which the smoke was forcing its way. I found Mr. Reynolds, a watchman, in the passage, and Mr. Baldwin, a clerk in the contract office, already in his room, preparing to remove his books. A few other persons soon joined us, and we proceeded to remove the books in every room on the lower floor, after which an accession of force proceeded to secure the files of papers and the furniture. While engaged in removing the books, I twice observed persons attempting to open the door which led from the passage into the City Post Office, whom I requested to desist, lest the smoke, if not the flame, should rush in upon us, and prevent our saving the books and papers. On their expressing a belief that the fire could be extinguished, I told them to go to the front or end door of the City Post Office, whence the fire was much more accessible. Some of them stated that those doors were fast, and inquired whether they should break them open. I answered in the affirmative, and they left the Department, as I understood, for the purpose of breaking open the doors, and making an attempt to extinguish the fire. At that moment no light appeared over the door, the fire being obscured and partially smothered, it is presumed, by a dense smoke.

Having seen all the books sent out of the first story, I went up into the second. In the big room (so called) I observed Mr. Suter, principal pay clerk, busily employed, with several others, in carrying out the books of the Auditor's office. I passed through that room to the rooms of the appointment office, which adjoined the Patent Office, on the second story, and, as I believed, saw all the books of that office sent out.

In the passage I observed Mr. Ellsworth, the Commissioner of Patents, attempting to force open a closed window or door leading from the second floor of the General Post Office into the passage of the Patent Office. Apprehending that the smoke, if not the fire, would render it impossible to enter the passage of the Patent Office, and that the only effect of opening that avenue would be to cut short our exertions to save the contents of the General Post Office, I so intimated to Mr. Ellsworth. Instantly reflecting, however, that he must feel it his duty to use all possible means to save the books of his own office, I turned from him to renew my exertions. There were scuttles through the floor at the end of the passages in the General Post Office, next to the Patent Office and the City Post Office, through which the smoke was rapidly ascending from the door of the City Post Office, and I expected every instant to see it followed by flames. If Mr. Ellsworth had effected an entrance there, it would have been at the imminent hazard of his life, as his retreat was liable every moment to be cut off. I met with him again in the building, when he told me he could not even find a ladder by which he might enter the windows of the second story and save his books.

On turning from Mr. Ellsworth the first time, I met Mr. Eliot, the chief examiner, who told me the doors in the third story were locked, and inquired whether he should break them. I answered in the affirmative, and followed him back through the big room and up into the third story, where I saw him and another gentleman forcing the doors of the rooms.

Having observed, from the illumination of the street in front, that the flames had burst out, it now occurred to me that my family might not be safe, as the wind might drive the flames in the direction of my dwelling-house, which, though covered with slate, was connected with a porch, and was near other buildings not so secured. I found the street in front of the General Post Office abandoned, and the heat so intense that I could scarcely pass on the opposite side. The flames were pouring in torrents out of the windows of the City Post Office and of the Patent Office, and were just bursting from the roof above. There was a gentle wind from a southwesterly direction, which drove the smoke and burning cinders immediately over my dwelling-house and those in the vicinity. The flaming cinders had already alighted in several places on the shingle roofs of the opposite houses, and I gave up for lost the entire blocks on both sides of Seventh street in the rear of the Post Office. I sent my wife and children to a place of safety, gave instructions to the servants, and leaving the house in charge of a few kind friends who volunteered to guard it, went out through a shower of fire, and returned by F street to the General Post Office. I again ascended to the third story, apprehending that there were books and papers in that quarter not yet removed, but found the passage entirely abandoned, and so full of dense smoke, that it could scarcely be entered without suffocation. Here ended my own efforts to rescue any thing from the building. The flames were then making fearful progress in the lower passage, and had spread through most of the roof.

Passing around to give such directions as seemed to be required in relation to the guarding and preservation of the books, papers, and furniture, which appeared in various directions upon the side pavements and streets, I returned to my dwelling, which I found free from danger, the wind having veered to the south, so that the cinders were falling upon the open lot and upon the back parts of the houses and on the out-houses upon the west side of Seventh street, which were well protected by the vigilance of their owners and occupants, aided by a few of the citizens.

Early in the morning I caused all the books and papers which were lying in piles or scattered about the streets to be conveyed to my house and deposited in the parlors. The furniture I directed to be collected in an open lot, and a guard set over it, which was done.

Of the cause of the fire, or the particular spot where it originated, I know nothing. I observed neither fire nor smoke about the basement of the City Post Office; but, having first discovered it above, it was natural that I should not look for it below. From the statements of the watchman who was on duty in the General Post Office, of the clerks of the City Post Office, and of other persons who made their observations ten or fifteen minutes before I did, my conviction is, that it originated in the basement, directly under the principal room of the City Post Office, and, when I first came out, had burnt through the floor. No fires were kept in the basement of the City Post Office, and although it is ascertained that ashes were sometimes deposited there in a box on the cellar floor, no circumstance has come to my knowledge making it probable that the fire originated from them. Nor do I know any circumstance tending to show that it was the work of an incendiary, other than the fact that those rooms containing fuel were accessible from the street, and the absence of any other known cause.

One of the watchmen of the General Post Office, then on duty in the lower passage, reports to me that he was first alarmed by the smell of smoke, as if from smothered fire, and, after examining sundry rooms in the General Post Office, discovered that the smoke came up through the cracks of a trap-door in the passage, close to the door of the City Post Office. Attempting to descend into the basement of the General Post Office, his candle was extinguished by a current of air mingled with smoke, when he gave the alarm by thumping at the door of the City Post Office, and crying fire in the streets.

If there be any other point on which information is desired by your committee, I shall be happy to give it as far as it is in my power.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

AMOS KENDALL.

HON. JOHN M. ROBINSON,
Chairman Com. P. O. and P. R., Senate.

CITY POST OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., Dec. 21, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter advising me that the committee of the Senate charged with an inquiry into the causes of the late conflagration of the Post Office building would be gratified to receive from me any information on the subject which might tend to promote the investigation as directed by the Senate.

Of my own personal observation I know but little. I left the office between 7 and 8 o'clock the evening before, enjoining upon the clerks, as was my habit ever since I have been charged with the office, to be careful with the lights and fires. On the first alarm in the morning I repaired to the office; perceived a dense smoke issuing from the eastern part of the building, but saw no light or fire. My first effort was to collect the clerks, with the view of entering the office to save the letters, &c. One of them (Mr. Kennedy) at length appeared, and admonished me not to make the attempt, assuring me that it would prove fatal. I persisted, notwithstanding, but was restrained by him and others, all of whom represented it as impracticable, and that repeated attempts had been made in vain, when there was less danger. This brief statement comprises all the information on the subject, not derived from others, that I possess.

As to what I have heard in relation to it, I presume the committee would prefer to learn it from the sources from which I derived it. I would therefore respectfully refer them to B. L. Bogan, Christopher Lansdale, Cornelius Cox, Samuel Crown, and James Summers—the first two of whom left the office at half past 2 o'clock in the morning of the fire, leaving the other three in charge of the office; to James A. Kennedy, a clerk in my office, John F. Callan, M. Callan, John Suter, Jacob Gideon, jun., George S. Gideon, Samuel P. Walker, Dr. Alexander Davis, John C. Rives, Robert S. Patterson, James Laurensen, Thomas Donoho, and Lambert Tree—all of whom, living near, were early at the fire.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. JONES, Postmaster.

HON. JOHN M. ROBINSON, Chairman, &c.

PATENT OFFICE, December 21, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of yours of the 20th instant, and, in obedience to the instruction of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, beg leave respectfully to state, that the section of the Post Office building assigned to the Patent Office, and under my official charge, comprised the second and third stories of the eastern part of said building, immediately over the City Post Office.

I reached the Patent Office at a very early period of the recent conflagration, (about 4 o'clock, A. M.,) and made every personal effort to enter the office, but in vain. The same causes which prevented those who slept directly under it, in the City Post Office, rendered it impossible for me to enter, or to save any portion of public property under my charge.

I beg leave respectfully to suggest to the honorable committee the names of honorable Mr. Ruggles of the Senate, Dr. T. P. Jones, Mr. and Mrs. Steiger, and Henry Bishop, as persons who, either living directly opposite the Post Office building, or very early present at the conflagration, may perhaps be able to communicate some useful information to the honorable committee in regard to it.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

HENRY L. ELLSWORTH.

Hon. JOHN M. ROBINSON,

Chairman Com. P. O. and P. R. of the Senate.

Testimony of Mr. Ellsworth.

I was awoke by Mr. Steiger a few minutes before 4 o'clock, on the 15th December, and arrived at the fire a few minutes after four. My first examination was to ascertain the place of the fire, with the hope of extinguishing it. The City Post Office was in flames, visible through window, and no one could enter it.

I went around the whole building, and looked into the cellars as far as I could, but no fire was seen in any of them. I made an effort to reach the Patent Office by the usual door on the east side, but the smoke prevented me. I then made an effort to get into the Patent Office through the third story, as there was a window connecting the General Post Office and the Patent Office, through which window wood was passed into the Patent Office. Previous to my attempting to get into the Patent Office this way, one of the clerks had broken through an inner door of the City Post Office, and the smoke ascended so fast that I could not succeed in my object, although Mr. Steiger, Mr. Bishop, and myself, took up the carpet in Mr. Johnson's room to lay over the aperture through which the smoke ascended.

I abandoned any further effort to save the Patent Office papers from the inside of the building, and next tried to get a ladder to enter the window on the north side of the building, but no ladder could be obtained.

I ought to remark that, while examining as to the place of the fire, I met Mr. Kyle, superintendent of the building, and asked him if he knew where the fire was. He said he had been into the cellar, and passed along the passage until he came under the City Post Office, and that he saw fire dropping down upon the floor above on to the ground, and that there was nothing on the ground to burn—the fire came from above—he passed the cellar in which the Patent Office wood is kept, but did not say he saw any fire there.

After I had been at the fire, as nearly as I can recollect, about fifteen or twenty minutes, I saw Doctor Jones (of the City Post Office) earnestly calling for his clerks. He inquired of me if my messenger was there—he wanted to ask him where and when he put ashes in the cellar. I called Mr. Bishop, who was near by. He then told Doctor Jones, in my presence, that he had just been into the cellar in which the Patent Office kept their wood and ashes, and there was no fire in the cellar; and further said, that if either Doctor Jones or myself would go into the cellar, he would go in with us, and we could satisfy ourselves. We were then all standing very near the cellar windows opening into the room where the Patent Office wood and ashes were kept. Not the least ray of light was discoverable in the cellar at that time. If not improper, I will add that, from my knowledge of the building, it seems utterly impossible that, if the building was safe at three o'clock, when the mail was delivered, the City Post Office could not be in such a general conflagration at half past three, by the ignition of ashes in the cellar. The honorable Mr. Ruggles was among the first at the fire, and opened the door leading into the City Post Office, and can describe the situation of the fire.

HENRY L. ELLSWORTH.

SENATE CHAMBER, January 22, 1837.

SIR: In compliance with your request to furnish you with a statement of what knowledge I have respecting the conflagration of the Post Office and Patent Office building on the fifteenth of December, I enclose a copy of my testimony, as taken down by the committee of the House in their investigation of the same subject, furnished to me by the clerk of that committee. It saves me the trouble of writing it out again.

In addition to that I will state two or three circumstances which have fallen under my observation. A few years since I was in the clerk's office in Lincoln county, Maine, where all the records of deeds and probate and court records for the county were kept. It was in the spring, and a man was removing a stove which had, during the winter, been standing in the middle of the room. It stood about 10 or 12 inches from the floor, with about two inches of sand under it, retained within cleets, to protect the floor from the heat of the stove. On the sand being removed, I observed the floor to have been burned and charred in two places directly under the stove, each place as large as my two hands. I broke up and removed the charred board easily with my finger. The under floor board was but a little discolored, not charred. The floor had been ignited and gone out of itself, not finding in its progress any current of air to feed or blow it into a flame.

Another case in my neighborhood was where a cook-stove stood about a foot from the plastered ceiling. The laths took fire on the other side of the plastering, and the house came near burning down. It is not probable that the ceiling was at any time made so warm by the stove that one could not bear his hand upon it. Another similar instance occurred in the same place in a jeweller's shop, the stove standing 8 or 10 inches from the ceiling. With in a few rods of these a fire broke out on Sunday afternoon, in a store in which there had been no fire for 24 hours. It proved to have taken in the beam on which the chamber fireplace rested. The hearth on the beam was composed of three thicknesses of brick. I have been informed of two other like instances in the vicinity where I live. In each of these cases the heat of the fire was wholly insufficient to produce immediate combustion. It was only by the long and uniform communication of it to the combustible material, through the medium of a slow conductor, excluding the external air, that ignition took place. Under such circumstances, caloric acts slowly and chemically upon the fibre of the wood, producing a latent ignition, which gradually proceeds until the supply of caloric ceases, when its progress is stopped; or until it meets with a gentle current of air coming in through some crevice, which feeds and fans it into a flame. There is a certain combination of circumstances which will always produce this effect. The principal circumstances are those I have mentioned—a uniform supply of caloric passing through a slowly and steadily conducting medium in contact with the wood, excluding the external air, and continued for a considerable length of time.

Burning of the Post Office Building.

[24th Cong. 2d Sess.]

The stove in the City Post Office, I understand, stood upon a pavement of brick of a single thickness, resting on the floor, perhaps filled in between with mortar or sand. Were or were not the circumstances here combined precisely those which are shown to be sufficient to produce latent ignition? A crevice in the floor would supply the other circumstance necessary to produce open combustion. Had there been nothing on the floor, there would have been much less danger; indeed, none, except from coals falling on the floor. Sheet-iron or other metallic plate is a much safer material on which to place a stove, than brick, mortar, or sand.

I am, most respectfully, your obedient servant,
JOHN RUGGLES.

Hon. JOHN M. ROBINSON,
Chairman Com. of the Senate on Post Office, &c.

In corroboration of the opinion of Mr. Ruggles, he requests the following statement, in regard to the recent fire in the Bank of England, may be hereto annexed.

Protection of the Bank of England against fire.

The recent fire in the printing department within the Bank of England, and the vast importance of their being a full assurance of safety for the enormous amount of securities and moneys deposited in this national establishment, may render the following account of the means of protection against any accident from fire, which the bank possesses within itself, interesting to the public generally.

In the first place, the entire building is erected in a manner cautiously designed to prevent the spread of fire. In every department are strong rooms for the nightly lodging of books, moneys, and securities, and closets within these rooms, which, together with the rooms themselves, are deemed to be perfectly fire-proof. There is a nightly guard of 32 soldiers sent from the tower, who have each his assigned post within the building. There are, besides, a number of the porters, of the principal clerks, and of other officers of the establishment, constantly resident within the walls of the building. A nightly watch of the confidential officers of the bank, who take turns in rotation, is rigidly required. A general survey of every department and office of the building is made by those gentlemen, who are on duty thrice in the course of every night, namely, at ten o'clock, at midnight, and at four o'clock in the morning. Occasional surveys of the more important apartments are made in the intervals between these stated times, of more or less extent, according to circumstances, and the degree of vigilance of the gentlemen whose turn it is to keep watch. It was to this wise precaution that the timely discovery of the recent fire is attributed.

There are seven very excellent fire-engines kept within the bank, which are monthly inspected by the maker, and there is in every department a good supply of fire-buckets. In each of the yards of the bank are capacious tanks, judiciously placed, and kept constantly filled with water. The only deficiencies seem to be the not having two or three resident porters practically acquainted with the management of engines, and the want of pickaxes, saws, and crow-bars, to tear up timbers, floorings, or partitions, which might catch fire.

Of the cause of the late fire, upon a careful survey, no doubt could exist. The aperture cut through the flooring by the workmen, and which was supposed by the clerk of the works to have caused the fire, by the fall of some accidental spark, was found to be wholly untouched by fire, so that no doubt can exist but the iron hearth had, for many days past, been allowed, by the accumulation of burning cinders, to become thoroughly "saturated with heat;" and iron being a powerful retainer and conductor of heat, the strong beam that passed under the hearth, and the ends of the girders which rested thereon, were gradually undergoing a process decay, from the constant action of heat, till at last they burst into a state of combustion. The property within the bank is wholly uninsured.

Testimony of the Hon. John Ruggles, Senator in Congress, December 30, 1836.

I, John Ruggles, having been duly sworn, testify as follows:

I board at Mrs. Carlisle's, at the corner of Pennsylvania avenue and Seventh street, and was awakened by the cry of "fire at the Post Office." I went as soon as possible to that building, and found, perhaps, half a dozen persons standing about it. Observing the eastern door open, I entered it and attempted to enter the letter-room of the city office, one leaf of the inner door being open about eight inches. In opening it, and attempting to enter, I found the heat so intense that I could not, and my hair and eye-brows were scorched. Standing at the door, and stooping so as to look under the smoke, I saw the fire burning about 20 feet from me, it might have been more, in an oblique direction to my left. There was a hole through the floor about the size of a small centre table. I saw it burning round the edges of the hole distinctly, and some fire blazing up through the hole. I noticed no object about the fire. It is my impression that I met a person at the door passing out from the letter room with a bucket; and while in the door I had an impression that water had been thrown toward the fire, but did not reach it, and, from the distance, that it would be impossible to reach it without an engine. I made several ineffectual attempts to close the door to smother the fire until an engine could be procured, but could not, by reason of some obstacle which I did not then perceive. I went and made inquiries where water could be found, and was told there was a pump across the street a little above. I made some attempt to form a line from the pump to the office; there were, however, but few persons present, perhaps ten or a dozen; but I supposed the number would be increasing rapidly. I then directed my attention to the procuring of an engine. Two or three persons were endeavoring to get the engine near by from the engine-house into the street. I assisted in drawing it to the pump. Two or three persons employed themselves in endeavoring to put it into working order, and in unwinding and drawing out the hose. After some time it was announced that it was not in a condition to be used. I then passed to the south front door of the City Post Office, and found some person endeavoring to force it with an axe. This was ten or fifteen minutes after I first arrived at the building, and the dense smoke was issuing through the letter-hole in that door. I earnestly entreated them not to break the door down until water could be procured, as it would serve to feed the flame and increase the rapidity of its progress. They very reluctantly desisted. Some time after an engine was brought in front of the City Post Office, about which time a window of the City Post Office, I believe the second east of the door, was broken in, a volume of dense smoke first issued, and instantly afterwards a very brilliant flame. After the flame had been issuing a short time, an engine played into the window, and the flames which issued from the window were extinguished instantly; but the water was soon exhausted, the hose having become separated which connected with the hydraulion at the pump which supplied the engine before the building. The flames soon after burst out anew. After some time, the hose was again connected, but there appeared to be a scanty supply of water, and the action of the engine was too feeble to throw the water with any effective power into the building.

After the fire, Mr. Cox, a clerk in the City Post Office, described to me the location of the large stove in the letter-room, which corresponded very nearly with the location of the fire, as I saw it.

At any time within 15 or 20 minutes after I arrived at the building, an engine in order, with an efficient company, and a supply of water, would, in my opinion, have extinguished the fire with but little difficulty. I did not notice any smoke issuing from under the platform of the east door when I first arrived at the building; there might have been without my perceiving it. Some ten minutes after I arrived, I looked along at the basement windows in front of the building, as far as the City Post Office door, and along the eastern end of Seventh street, and under the platform of the east door, in order to see if there was any fire in the cellar. I saw none, and did not notice smoke at any of them. I looked at the windows at a little distance, and it was so dark that I was unable to see whether the windows were or were not closed by shutters.

JOHN RUGGLES.

Statement of James Summers.

I have been called the "watchman" of the City Post Office, but the labor I had to perform differing materially from that of watchman, it may be necessary to explain that my duties, through the fore part of the night, were to assist in preparing the mails for delivery; that, upon closing the east door, which was usually done about 10 o'clock, P. M., I was at liberty to retire to rest; but the arrival of several heavy mails after that hour being calculated to disturb my repose, I but seldom retired before midnight. The duties of receiving and delivering all the mails that came in or left the office during the night devolved also upon me. Thus was I employed until about five or six months preceding the fire, when I was required to leave the labors of the office, and to select such a position in my room every night as would enable me to see all persons coming into or leaving the office until the east door was closed, and to receive and deliver the mails through the night, as above stated.

On the night of the conflagration I retired to bed about midnight. The driver who carries the Southern mail to the steamboat, rang me up about three o'clock, A. M. The mail was delivered to him; and after passing out at the door, looking around, and discovering no human being except the driver, nor aught else to attract attention, I returned, closed and locked the door, and retired to bed, where I soon fell into a profound sleep.

About one hour after, I was aroused by Mr. Crown, a messenger, who slept in the postmaster's room, and who, upon entering my chamber, exclaimed, with a voice indicating much alarm, "Good God! Mr. Summers, where does all this smoke come from?" I immediately sprang out of bed, and perceiving my room filled with a dense smoke, which I knew, both by smell and color, proceeded from the burning of pine wood; and our coals being kindled with pine, my first research was to ascertain whether the smoke might not proceed from a burning chunk fallen from the grate, and rolled towards the fender. Finding nothing amiss about my fire, I immediately went into the room where the messenger slept, to examine his fire; but, upon entering it, found he had none. Disappointed in these researches, and now, for the first time, alarmed for the safety of the building and its valuable contents, I hastened out at the east door, where I immediately discovered the smoke issuing from a window directly under the platform. Stooping under the platform, I perceived the smoke passing obliquely to my right, but could see no fire. While prosecuting this examination, Mr. Crown suddenly spoke of Mr. Cox's danger. Knowing that he was unusually hard to wake, and therefore greatly alarmed for his safety, I ran into my room, and rang the bell with great force. He soon after appeared in his night clothes, and greatly alarmed.

Perceiving the density of the smoke to be rapidly increasing, I again went out and crept further under the platform, in order to ascertain the location of the fire; but, although

I could then distinctly hear the roaring of the flames, I could not see it. An effort had been made, both by Mr. Crown and myself, to alarm our neighbors by the cry of fire, as soon as it was known to be under the building. And now, aware of the increasing danger, and that our force was inadequate to a successful attack on so formidable an enemy, we commenced a more general cry. I then crossed over 7th street, passed the opposite row of buildings, and with loud cries endeavored to alarm their inhabitants; but sleep apparently seemed to hold the dominion; not a window was hoisted, nor voice from within heard. I again returned to the Post Office, and passed along the south side to the west end, where I was asked by some person from within, "what was the matter?" I answered, the Post Office is on fire. I then ran down 7th street to Pennsylvania avenue; and in passing up the avenue, I met with three black boys, who, at my request, assisted in giving the alarm. I continued up the avenue to 10th street, passed up 10th to E, and then along E to the office. In performing this round I awoke many persons. On my arrival at the office I found a number of persons engaged in moving the furniture and books of the General Post Office; and perceiving through the window blinds that the flame had made its way into the City Post Office, and all hope of extinguishing the fire at an end, I joined and continued in the labors of removal until the close of the scene.

JAMES SUMMERS.

The deponent further says that there was no plaster or ceiling over head in the cellars of the Post Office building; the floor joists, or timbers on which the floors laid, were totally uncovered. At the time he first passed out at the east door of the Post Office, and saw the smoke issuing from under the great step-stone, or platform, he passed round the corner to the south side of the building, but did not see or discover any smoke or fire coming out of the south windows of the building; the window under the platform was open, and the windows on the south side were closed. The wood in the cellar of the City Post Office was packed from the ground up to the floor.

JAMES SUMMERS.

Statement of Samuel Crown.

Samuel Crown, of Washington, D. C., testifies and says that he is the messenger to the City Post Office, and remained in the office all the night of the conflagration of the General Post Office, which took place on the morning of the 15th of December last; that he makes the fires for said office. On the morning of the 14th of December, this deponent took up the ashes in the fireplace in said office, where there had been a fire on the day previous, and carried the ashes and deposited them in the passage in the cellar under said office, about equidistant from two door-ways opening from said passage into the wood-rooms of said Post Office, which were then occupied with wood and coal for the use of the office; there were openings also on the north side of said passage, one occupied as a wood-room, and the other leading up stairs into the room occupied as the Post Office. The ashes were placed on the ground of the cellar, and against the brick partition wall. The ground of the cellar was damp at the time; the ashes were cold when taken up, and no fire seen in them; there was about one barrel of ashes on the ground at the time he deposited the ashes, as above stated.

This deponent says that he was in the office until thirty-five minutes after two o'clock on the morning of the 15th, when he retired to his bed, in the southeast corner room, commonly occupied by Doctor Jones. This deponent was awake at three o'clock, and heard the Southern mail when it left the office. Some time afterwards, about or nearly four o'clock, this deponent was awake by the smoke in the room; he immediately arose, and, after examining his own room, went into the passage leading out of the east door, and discovered the outside door open; there was as much smoke in the entry as in his room; he then went out of the east door, and went round on the south front of the building, and examined the cellar windows, and perceived smoke coming out of all the windows, and at the window nearest the south door of the Post Office discovered considerable heat issuing from the window; he then cried fire! fire! went back and alarmed Mr. Cox, first by ringing the bell leading to his room, then by going outside, round to his window, and knocking against it, and then rang the bell again. Mr. Cox then came out of his room, and then the deponent went to the window from whence the heat issued, to show Mr. Cox; but whether Mr. Cox went to the window or not this deponent cannot say. Mr. Cox advised him to go after Mr. Kennedy, the chief clerk in the City Post Office; he, the deponent, went after Mr. Kennedy, awoke, him, and then returned to the Post Office, and went into the room where he slept, and got his pantaloons; the room was then so full of smoke he could not breathe in it. Mr. Kennedy soon came, and we went to the south window, where the smoke and heat continued to issue, but did not see any fire; then the deponent went to assist in getting out the engine. After we got the engine in readiness, it proved to be out of order and useless; the deponent then went into the Post Office, and discovered fire about the centre of the room, not far from the stove; the fire immediately spread with great rapidity until the whole building was on fire. That, previous to his calling Mr. Cox, he attempted to go down cellar with a candle, but could not for the density of the smoke.

SAMUEL CROWN.

Statement of Henry Bishop, sen.

I am messenger of the Patent Office, which office I have held six years last November.

On the night of the fire I was alarmed by a knocking at my next door neighbor's house, and heard a person say that the Post Office was on fire; I immediately rose out of bed, dressed myself, looked at my watch, which was about half past four; it is generally too fast. I called my eldest son, Henry, a young man, and sent him to Mr. Ellsworth's house to inform him of the fire.

I immediately went to the building, ascended the steps of the City Post Office on E street, looked in at the window east of the steps, and saw that the large room was full of black smoke, with a red blaze in about the middle of the room, in a northeasterly direction from where I stood. I did not stay more than a minute in this place; my first object was to get into the Patent Office, having the keys with me. I attempted to get into the building at the door on 7th street, but from some cause which I do not well recollect, I could not enter; whether the door was fast or the smoke prevented I cannot positively say. I then went to the front of the building on E street, passed through the door of the General Post Office into the yard north of the building. I then went to a back door communicating with the City Post Office and Patent Office, found it open, with a great deal of smoke in the passage, apparently coming from the large room occupied by the City Post Office. I attempted several times to ascend the stairs of the Patent Office, but the smoke was so thick and suffocating that I was obliged to desist.

I then went into the yard north of the building, and saw a person looking into the cellars to see if there was any fire to be seen, but there was none. I then went to the front of the building on E street, to examine the Patent Office cellar, which was under the City Post Office; I pushed open the shutter just west of the City Post Office steps and went into the cellar, where I could see nothing, for it was total darkness.

I then left the cellar. By this time Mr. Ellsworth had arrived, and I joined him; we made some more attempts to get into the Patent Office, which were unsuccessful; the smoke and flames filled the building, and we were obliged to retreat.

After all hope of saving the building had been given up, and I was watching the progress of the fire, I was informed that Dr. Jones, City Postmaster, was speaking about ashes being kept in the Patent Office cellar, under the City Post Office, and conveyed the idea that the fire might have originated there. I immediately went to Mr. Ellsworth, and told him of the remarks of Dr. Jones. While I was speaking to Mr. Ellsworth, Dr. Jones came where we were; I then told Mr. Ellsworth and Dr. Jones that there could not be any fire in the Patent Office cellar, for I had been in the cellar since the fire, and it was entirely dark. I likewise offered, in the presence of Mr. Ellsworth and Dr. Jones, to open the shutter and go in again, but they said it was not worth while.

On the subject of the ashes I have to state that, as soon as the clerks left the office for the day, the fire was not covered with ashes to keep fire for the next day, but the brands were put together, a screen put before the fire, and the fire left to burn out, so that there was very seldom any fire the next morning. In the morning the ashes were taken up in an iron hod, and never emptied till the next day, and sometimes longer; the day previous to the fire, Wednesday, ashes had been emptied from the Patent Office that had been taken from the hearths on the Monday previous, and perhaps some might have been taken up on Tuesday; but I am sure there was none taken up on Wednesday. The ashes were put in a large wooden box in the cellar, under the large room occupied by the City Post Office; the box stood by itself on a ground floor, about eight or nine feet from the floor above.

HENRY BISHOP.

Statement of Cornelius Cox.

Cornelius Cox, a clerk in the City Post Office, testifies and says that, on the morning of the 15th of December last I was awoke by some noise, and upon getting up immediately concluded the office was on fire, as the room was filled with smoke. I opened the door which led into the Post Office, and ran through out of the east door to a room occupied by Mr. Summers. In doing this I suppose I passed through 15 or 20 feet of the office, and saw no light; but the smoke was so dense that it was with great difficulty that I could breathe, and heard a crackling under the floor very distinctly. In Mr. Summers's room I met him and Mr. Crown. I said, Crown, where in the world does all this smoke come from? He said he did not know, but believed the cellar was on fire. I then asked him if he had been down in the cellar. He said no, but had attempted to do so, and proceeded a few steps, when he found the smoke so thick that it put out his candle, and was forced back for fear of suffocation. I told him to go over and wake up Mr. Kennedy, one of the clerks of the office, who lives within a half a square. I then ran out of the office on the pavement to the front, and saw the smoke coming out of the window under the steps at the east of the office, and had a full view of the whole front, but saw no person up to this time, with the exception of Summers and Crown. I then went back again through the office to my room, for the purpose of dressing myself, and in passing over the floor heard the crackling and rumbling of the fire below so clearly that I was apprehensive the floor would give way, and also a knocking at the door communicating with the Post Office Department. I put on my pantaloons, took my coat in my hand, and jumped out of the window at the back of the office, and ran round again to the front, not returning in the same way that I went in, on account of the great danger, as I thought at the time, of the floor falling in. I there met Mr. Crown, and asked him if he had been over for Mr. Kennedy. He told me he had. (I was very anxious to get this gentleman over as early as possible, as I knew he had the key of the desk which contained the money belonging to the office.) Crown then went around and burst the cellar windows open until he came to the third one from the east corner, when he said, here, Mr. Cox, here it is (meaning the fire) just under here. I looked, but could see nothing but the smoke rushing out. At this time I recognised Mr. John Suter, of the Post Office Department, and four or five others. Mr. Kennedy then came over and tried to enter the office at the east door, but was repulsed by the smoke. I told him that the window of my room was open, and probably he might get in there. We then went round, and the smoke was issuing from it very thick. He told me I had better get in and save some of my clothing. I did so, and threw out a part of them, having every moment to thrust my head out of the window for air. After I got out of the window, and was gathering up the clothes that I had thrown out, I saw Mr. Bishop, the messenger of the Patent Office, who told me that he had been trying to get up to that office, but could not do so for the smoke. After this I went in the Post Office Department and assisted in saving the books and papers belonging to that Department. Neither time that I passed through or looked into the City Post Office was there any fire to be seen, nor did it get through for 20 or 30 minutes after I was up. If the fire had originated in the City Post Office, it would have been seen immediately, as there was a great quantity of combustible material there. I would here state that we got through the work and closed the office that morning about half past two o'clock, and I was up about ten minutes after the other clerks had gone, during which time I attended particularly to extinguishing the lights and securing the fires; looked into the stove and saw that the fire had nearly gone out, there being nothing but a few coals, and they nearly covered with ashes; placed a brick before the door, and went over to the fireplace. In this fireplace we burnt coal, and were in the habit of keeping fire throughout the night; it had gone down lower than usual, and fresh coal had been thrown on, so as to completely cover up all the fire there was remaining, and I was fearful that it would go out entirely; saw that a large iron screen which we had was placed before it, for the purpose of keeping any coals that might fall off the grate from rolling on the floor.

The carpenter's work throughout the office had shrunk generally, and the floor, particularly, was very open, so much so that I have often noticed places about the washboards, where it had been neglected to have been swept for a short time, covered with coal dust and other dirt blown up through the crevices from the cellar, which will account for the office being so full of smoke.

It was impossible to open the door at the south front of the office. I was the only person that penetrated any distance in. When I first came out I did so without knowing what was the matter; and when I went back, it was under the impression that I was risking my life; but had nothing on but my shirt, and forced myself through. It is my decided opinion that if any person had attempted to open that door from the inside, they would have suffocated, as they not only would have been obliged to have gone a very considerable distance through the office, which was obstructed by tables and baskets used for the distribution of newspapers, and to have opened a door leading into the lobby, which was locked, before they could have got to the main door, which was locked, bolted, and barred, besides having a large letter-box placed before it, which would have had to be removed. But there was no necessity for opening that door, as any person disposed to enter the office could have tried through the east door, as that entrance was open the whole time.

The great Eastern mail arrived about 15 minutes after 11 o'clock on the night of the fire. The letters and papers were taken out of the mail-bags, and those for the members of Congress placed in boxes ready to be delivered to the messengers of the two Houses; and the letters for the citizens were distributed in the several appropriate boxes. The boxes containing the letters and papers for members of Congress were in the southeast corner of the room of the Post Office. It is my opinion that those letters and papers could not have been saved, on account of the dense smoke. The Port Tobacco, Warrenton, and Georgetown mails were in the room occupied by Dr. Jones. These mails might have been saved if we had thought of them immediately after getting up; but we were occupied in giving the alarm and ascertaining where the fire was, so that they entirely escaped our attention. The large mails had all left the office. The Southern mail was the last, which was about 3 o'clock in the morning.

CORNELIUS COX.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT LAW.

Petition of Thomas Moore, and other authors of Great Britain, praying Congress to grant to them the exclusive benefit of their writings within the United States.

FEBRUARY 2, 1837.

Referred to a select committee, consisting of Messrs. Clay, Preston, Buchanan, Webster, and Ewing of Ohio.

Address of certain authors of Great Britain to the Senate of the United States in Congress assembled, respectfully showing:

That authors of Great Britain have long been exposed to injury in their reputation and property from the want of a law by which the exclusive right to their respective writings may be secured to them in the United States of America:

That, for want of such law, deep and extensive injuries have of late been inflicted on their reputation and property, and on the interests of literature and science, which ought to constitute a bond of union and friendship between the United States and Great Britain:

That, from the circumstance of the English language being common to both nations, the works of British authors are extensively read throughout the United States of America, while the profits arising from the sale of their works may be wholly appropriated by American booksellers, not only without the consent of the authors, but even contrary to their express desire; a grievance under which they have at present no redress:

That the works thus appropriated by American booksellers are liable to be mutilated and altered at the pleasure of the said booksellers, or of any other persons who may have an interest in reducing the price of the works, or in conciliating the supposed principles or prejudices of purchasers in the respective sections of your Union; and that the names of the authors being retained, they may be made responsible for works which they no longer recognise as their own:

That such mutilation and alteration, with the retention of the authors' names, have been of late actually perpetrated by citizens of the United States; under which grievances such authors have at present no redress.

That certain authors of Great Britain have recently made an effort in defence of their literary reputation and property, by declaring a respectable firm of publishers in New York to be the sole authorized possessors and issuers of the said works, and by publishing, in certain American newspapers, their authority to this effect:

That the object of the said authors has been defeated by the act of certain persons, citizens of the United States, who have unjustly published, for their own advantage, the works sought to be thus protected; under which grievance the said authors have at present no redress:

That American authors are injured by the non-existence of the desired law. While American publishers can provide themselves with works for publication, by unjust appropriation, instead of by equitable purchase, they are under no inducement to afford to American authors a fair remuneration for their labors; under which grievance American authors have no redress but in sending over their works to England to be published; an expedient which has become an established practice with some, of whom their country has most reason to be proud:

That the American public is injured by the non-existence of the desired law. The American public suffers not only from the discouragement afforded to native authors, as above stated, but from the uncertainty now existing as to whether the books presented to them as the works of British authors are the actual and complete productions of the writers whose names they bear:

That, in proof of the evil complained of, the case of Walter Scott might be referred to, as stated by an esteemed citizen of the United States; * that while the works of this author, dear alike to your country and to ours, were read from Maine to Georgia, from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, he received no remuneration from the American public for his labors; that an equitable remuneration might have saved his life, and would, at least, have relieved its closing years from the burden of debts and destructive toils:

That, deeply impressed with the conviction that the only firm ground of friendship between nations is a strict regard to simple justice, the undersigned earnestly request the Senate of the United States in Congress assembled speedily to use, in behalf of the authors of Great Britain, their power of securing to the authors the exclusive right to their respecting writings.

Memorial of a number of citizens of the United States, praying an alteration of the law regulating copyrights.

FEBRUARY 4, 1837.

Referred to a select committee, consisting of Messrs. Clay, Preston, Buchanan, Webster, Ewing of Ohio, and Ruggles.

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled :

The petition of the undersigned, citizens of the United States, respectfully represents :

That they believe native writers to be as indispensable as a native militia ; that, although foreign writers and foreign writings may be had cheaper, owing to the present law of copyright, our people must look for the defence of their habits, their opinions, and their peculiar institutions, to those who belong to them and have grown up with them—to their own authors, as to their own soldiers, whatever may be the cost in dollars and cents.

That, by the present law of copyright, our own authors are unable to contend with foreigners who are paid elsewhere :

That, by a change of the present law, with a view to the liberal encouragement of our own writers, and to the just and reasonable protection of others, by whose labors and discoveries we profit, we believe that our people, and the cause of learning, of science, and of literature, throughout the world, would be benefited :

Wherefore we respectfully pray that such changes may be had in the present law of copyright, as, while they insure to authors a safer interest in their property, to our own writers encouragement, and to foreigners a reasonable protection, the public may be secured against a discouraging monopoly, the commonwealth of literature opened to a fair and liberal competition, and the ground laid for a future international law of copyright between the Old World and the New.

And, as in duty bound, we shall ever pray, &c.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

February 16, 1837.

Mr. Clay made the following report :

The select committee to whom was referred the address of certain British and the petition of certain American authors have, according to order, had the same under consideration, and beg leave now to report :

That, by the act of Congress of 1831, being the law now in force regulating copyrights, the benefits of the act are restricted to citizens or residents of the United States ; so that no foreigner, residing abroad, can secure a copyright in the United States, for any work of which he is the author, however important or valuable it may be. The object of the address and petition, therefore, is to remove this restriction as to British authors, and to allow them to enjoy the benefits of our law.

That authors and inventors have, according to the practice among civilized nations, a property in the respective productions of their genius, is incontestable ; and that this property should be protected as effectually as any other property is by law, follows as a legitimate consequence. Authors and inventors are among the greatest benefactors of mankind. They are often dependent, exclusively, upon their own mental labors for the means of subsistence ; and are frequently, from the nature of their pursuits, or the constitutions of their minds, incapable of applying that provident care to worldly affairs which other classes of society are in the habit of bestowing. These considerations give additional strength to their just title to the protection of the law.

It being established that literary property is entitled to legal protection, it results that this protection ought to be afforded wherever the property is situated. A British merchant brings or transmits to the United States a bale of merchandise, and the moment it comes within the jurisdiction of our laws, they throw around it effectual security. But if the work of a British author is brought to the United States, it may be appropriated by any resident here, and republished, without any compensation whatever being made to the author. We should be all shocked if the law tolerated the least invasion of the rights of property, in the case of merchandise, whilst those which justly belong to the works of authors are exposed to daily violation, without the possibility of their invoking the aid of the laws.

The committee think that this distinction in the condition of the two descriptions of property is not just ; and that it ought to be remedied by some safe and cautious amendment of the law. Already the principle has been adopted in the patent laws, of extending their benefits to foreign inventions or improvements. It is but carrying out the same principle to extend the benefit of our copyright laws to foreign authors. In relation to the subjects of Great Britain and France, it will be but a measure of reciprocal justice ; for, in both of those countries, our authors may enjoy that protection of their laws for literary property which is denied to their subjects here.

Entertaining these views, the committee have been anxious to devise some measure which, without too great a disturbance of interests, or affecting too seriously arrangements which have grown out of the present state of things, may, without hazard, be subjected to the test of practical experience. Of the works which have heretofore issued from the foreign press, many have been already republished in the United States ; others are in a progress of republication, and some probably have been stereotyped. A copyright law which should embrace any of these works might injuriously affect American publishers, and lead to collision and litigation between them and foreign authors.

Acting, then, on the principles of prudence and caution, by which the committee have thought it best to be governed, the bill which the committee intend proposing provides that the protection which it secures shall extend to those works only which shall be published after its passage. It is also limited to the subjects of Great Britain and France ; among other reasons, because the committee have information that, by their laws, American authors can obtain there protection for their productions ; but they have no information that such is the case in any other foreign country. But, in principle, the committee perceive no objection to considering the republic of letters as one great community, and adopting a system of protection for literary property which should be common to all parts of it. The bill also provides that an American edition of the foreign work for which an American copyright has been obtained shall be published within reasonable time.

If the bill should pass, its operation in this country would be to leave the public, without any charge for copyright, in the undisturbed possession of all scientific and literary works published prior to its passage—in other words, the great mass of the science and literature of the world; and to entitle the British and French author only to the benefit of copyright in respect to works which may be published subsequent to the passage of the law.

The committee cannot anticipate any reasonable or just objection to a measure thus guarded and restricted. It may, indeed, be contended, and it is possible, that the new work, when charged with the expense incident to the copyright, may come into the hands of the purchaser at a small advance beyond what would be its price, if there were no such charge; but this is by no means certain. It is, on the contrary, highly probable that, when the American publisher has adequate time to issue carefully an edition of the foreign work, without incurring the extraordinary expense which he now has to sustain to make a hurried publication of it, and to guard himself against dangerous competition, he will be able to bring it into the market as cheaply as if the bill were not to pass. But if that should not prove to be the case, and if the American reader should have to pay a few cents to compensate the author for composing a work by which he is instructed and profited, would it not be just in itself? Has any reader a right to the use, without remuneration, of intellectual productions which have not yet been brought into existence, but lie buried in the mind of genius? The committee think not; and they believe that no American citizen would not feel it quite as unjust, in reference to future publications, to appropriate to himself their use, without any consideration being paid to their foreign proprietors, as he would to take the bale of merchandise, in the case stated, without paying for it; and he would the more readily make this trifling contribution, when it secured to him, instead of the imperfect and slovenly book now often issued, a neat and valuable work, worthy of preservation.

With respect to the constitutional power to pass the proposed bill, the committee entertain no doubt, and Congress, as before stated, has acted on it. The constitution authorizes Congress "to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing, for limited times, to authors and inventors, the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." There is no limitation of the power to natives or residents of this country. Such a limitation would have been hostile to the object of the power granted. That object was to promote the progress of science and useful arts. They belong to no particular country, but to mankind generally. And it cannot be doubted that the stimulus which it was intended to give to mind and genius—in other words, the promotion of the progress of science and the arts—will be increased by the motives which the bill offers to the inhabitants of Great Britain and France.

The committee conclude by asking leave to introduce the bill which accompanies this report.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 28, 1837.

Mr. Dromgoole, from the select committee to which the subject had been referred, made the following report:

The select committee to which was referred so much of the President's message as relates to amending the constitution of the United States, together with all propositions and resolutions, submitted at the last and present sessions of Congress, proposing amendments to the constitution, having heretofore been discharged from the consideration of all propositions and resolutions in reference to an amendment of the constitution on the subject of the election of President and Vice President, have, according to order, had under consideration the only remaining proposition, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The proposition which the committee have had under consideration was submitted at the previous session of this Congress, to wit: on February 13th, 1836, and is in the following form and words:

"Mr. Underwood submitted the following joint resolution to amend the constitution of the United States:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following amendments to the constitution thereof be proposed and recommended to the Legislatures of the several States, for their ratification, to wit:

"Amend the seventh section of the first article, by striking out the words 'two thirds of,' wherever they occur, and insert the words 'a majority of all the members elected to.'

"Amend the second section of the second article, by inserting after the words 'and which shall be established by law,' in the second paragraph of that section, the following words: 'except the Secretary of the Treasury, and such officers whose principal duties consist in collecting, or in receiving, or in disbursing, or in keeping accounts concerning, the revenue of the United States, or any part thereof.'

"Under the general head of amendments, add the following articles, to wit:

"ARTICLE XIII.

"§ 1. A Secretary of the Treasury shall be annually, or oftener, if needful, appointed by the joint vote of the Senate and House of Representatives, each Senator and Representative having one vote.

"§ 2. The Secretary of the Treasury shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, all officers whose principal duties consist either in collecting, or in receiving, or in disbursing, or in keeping accounts concerning, the revenue, or any part thereof. But Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers, whose duties pertain to the collection, receipt, or disbursement, of the revenue, or any part of it, as shall be deemed proper, in the Secretary of the Treasury alone.

"§ 3. In case of the death, removal, resignation, or disability, of the Secretary of the Treasury, the President of the United States shall designate some officer of the Treasury Department to perform the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury until a successor shall have been duly elected, or until the disability is removed.

"§ 4. In case of the death, removal, resignation, or disability, of any inferior officer connected with the Treasury Department, in the collection, or receipt, or disbursement of, or in keeping accounts concerning, the revenue, or any part of it, during the recess of the Senate, the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to fill the vacancy by granting commissions, which shall expire at the next ensuing session of Congress, unless the appointment to the vacant office had been exclusively conferred on him by law.

"ARTICLE XIV.

"The tenure of all offices, except such as are specially provided for in the constitution, and the mode of removal from office, shall be regulated by Congress.

"ARTICLE XV.

"Senators and Representatives shall not be eligible to any office on the nomination of the President, or on the nomination of the Secretary of the Treasury, during the time for which they were respectfully elected to serve in the Congress of the United States, and for two years next ensuing the expiration thereof.

"Resolved, That whenever three fourths of the Legislatures of the several States shall ratify the foregoing proposed amendments, or any one or more of them, the same, as thus ratified, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as a part of the constitution."

Your committee deem it proper to quote fully the seventh section of the first article of the constitution, in order that the amendment proposed thereto may be correctly understood.

"ARTICLE I.

"SECTION 7th. All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills.

"Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two thirds of the House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and, if approved by two thirds of that House, it shall become a law. But, in all such cases, the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the journal of each House, respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress, by their adjournment, prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law.

"Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary, (except on a question of adjournment,) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and, before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or, being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill."

A single glance will readily discover that the amendment seeks a modification of what is commonly denominated the veto power. It proposes (whenever a bill or resolution shall have been returned by the President with his objections) that, instead of the concurrence of two thirds of each House, the concurrence of a majority of all the members elected to each House shall be necessary to repass it.

The fifth section of the first article provides that a "majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business."

In one state of things the amendment might require a smaller number, and in another state of things a greater number, to overrule the negative, than is at present required. These positions will be rendered perfectly plain by illustration. The whole number of members in the House of Representatives is 242; of which, 122 is a majority and a constitutional quorum. Suppose a bare quorum to be present, and a bare majority (62) shall pass a bill, which bill is disapproved by the President, and returned with his objections: in this condition of things, the amendment would require the unanimous vote of the House to repass it, which would be an addition of 60 to the original vote, and 40 more than the constitution would now require; because 82, being two thirds, would be sufficient—an addition of twenty to the original vote. At present, 32 to 40 would sustain the bill against the President; but, under the amendment, as it would require the whole quorum, 122, it might happen that a single member could uphold the presidential veto against 121.

But suppose that the whole number elected, 242, be present; then the affirmative vote of 122 is necessary to the passage of a bill. In this supposed case, a returned bill would require the vote of 162 to repass it under the existing constitutional provision; whilst, under the proposed alteration, the same 122 might still give it effect, in defiance of the veto. The negative of the President, then, would be only equivalent to a motion to reconsider, and 40 members less would be required, in the affirmative, than are required by the present arrangement of the constitution.

In the first supposed case, the veto is too powerful, because it can only be overruled by a unanimous vote. In the last case, it may have no final effect in arresting the acts of the Legislature, because the same number of members, and the same majority, may act as effectively after the return of the bill, as they did on its original passage.

From the exhibited results, in the two extreme cases supposed, it becomes apparent, that as you ascend from a bare quorum to a greater number, and as you descend from the whole number to a smaller one, the difference in the operation of the existing provision and the proposed alteration gradually diminishes. In other words, the present qualification of the negative, and the desired substitute, gradually approximate from the two extreme points, until they meet on exactly middle ground, separated by no intervening space, and without any difference in the result of their agency to force them into comparison and collision. For example, take the mean number, which is 182. In case of a returned bill, the contemplated change would still require 122, being a majority of all the members elected, to concur in its re-enactment; and the constitution would also require 122, being two thirds of a House consisting of 182. Let it also be observed, that if a bill should pass by the vote of a bare majority, 92, and be returned by the President, under either plan an additional vote of 30 would be necessary to repass it. If it be more fair and reasonable to test the merits of this measure by arguments based upon the mean, rather than upon either extreme, then the conclusion is attained that the substitution of "majority," as proposed, for "two thirds," is, for all practical purposes, no amendment or alteration at all; and, therefore, its adoption ought not to be urged even by a mere desire that those may be gratified who are "ever studious of change, and fond of novelty."

Your committee do not know the fact, nor have they had an opportunity of examining the journal for its ascertainment; but they will, nevertheless, hazard the conjecture, that the mean between the whole number and a bare majority of the whole will be found to be a fair specimen of the average attendance of the members of the House of Representatives. It does not come within the recollection of the committee to have seen it stated that this estimate of average attendance constituted the basis upon which the concurrence of two thirds of the House was made to rest, in cases where the President, disapproving, refuses to sign. It may, however, well be supposed to have occurred to the wise and calculating framers of the constitution, and to have had some agency in fixing the requirement of two thirds. In ordinary cases, two thirds of those in actual attendance will very nearly approximate to the majority of the whole number elected.

The 7th section of the 1st article preserves a uniform ratio, in case of veto, between the powers of the President and the Congress, in every variety of a quorum, from a bare majority to the entire number; whilst the desired change destroys this uniformity. The constitution, sustained in this particular by all experience, has conceded that legislation may safely proceed in the absence of some of the members of the legislative body. It has not been held to be indispensable—indeed, it may be considered utterly hopeless and impracticable—to secure their unanimous attendance. The constitution, pursuing an unerring guide—the wisdom of experience—has ordained and established that a majority of the whole number is both a safe and practicable quorum. It is a fixed principle of the constitution, that the whole number of each branch of the Legislature, or a majority thereof, is competent to transact business; and, both being equally competent, the same rule is impartially applied to both; and in case of the veto, two thirds are invariably required to pass the bill or resolution.

The amendment leaves unassailed the principle that the whole number, or a bare majority, are equally competent to legislate, and yet gives a different rule or measure of power in reference to the President's negative. With a bare majority, the unanimous concurrence of a competent body is required; whilst, with the whole number present, a bare majority is deemed sufficient—the very smallest number which could originally adopt any measure. This inequality of operation is, of itself, an insurmountable objection to the contemplated plan. The uniform and just provision of the 7th section of the 1st article highly recommends its unaltered preservation.

The committee might here conclude this part of the matter under review, being well satisfied that they have clearly demonstrated the superiority of the existing arrangement over the modification contained in the amendment. But as, peradventure, there may be some lurking hostility to the very existence of the "veto," your committee will indulge in a brief inquiry into the propriety of its introduction into the constitution.

The wise framers of our constitution, discarding the apprehension "that a vigorous Executive is inconsistent with the genius of a republican Government," proceeded upon the idea that "energy in the Executive is a leading character in the definition of good government;" preserving, however, in the organization of this department, "a due dependence on the people; a due responsibility." Requisite energy can only be imparted to the Executive by the bestowal of "competent powers." Among the "competent powers," the same wise and virtuous statesmen thought it necessary to include "the qualified negative of the President upon the acts or resolutions of the two Houses of the Legislature; or, in other words, his power of returning all bills, with objections, which will have the effect of preventing their becoming laws, unless they should afterwards be ratified by two thirds of each of the component members of the legislative body." The qualified negative thus bestowed on the President, with a single exception—the question of adjournment—may be applied, according to his own sense of the propriety or necessity of the case, without restraint or discrimination, to any act or resolution of the two Houses of Congress. There was a two-fold object in granting this power. In the first place, it was designed as a means of self-defence to the Executive, to enable the President to counteract such proceedings of the legislative branch as tend to absorb the proper powers or infringe the just rights of the Executive. In the second place, it was intended to afford to the people themselves, through the instrumentality of a President of their own free choice, and possessing their confidence, "an additional security against the enactment of improper laws."

Your committee will not dwell on the tendency of the legislative body occasionally, especially in a free representative Government, to absorb the powers of the other departments; nor will they detain the House by a reference to the previous history of State and Federal legislation, to prove that sometimes a majority of the legislative body may happen to act under the influence of factious feelings, of an ill-advised precipitancy, or some hasty impulse unfriendly to the public good. Your committee are contented to allude to facts attested by all experience, and which no man of candor will deny. It is not a disturbed and feverish imagination which supposes, it is the recorded evidence of American experiments in the science of government which establishes, that there are evils inherent in, and inseparable from, a legislative body composed of representatives freely chosen by the great mass of the people.

For these evils a remedy was sought in the creation of a counterpoise. The creation of a counterpoise was evidently the result of that wise patriotism which designs to call philosophy to its aid. The sagacity to perceive imperfections, without the philosophical prudence to provide the antidote, might, in a moment of hasty despair, induce the abandonment of the whole system of representative government; because the finite intellect of man was insufficient to make it perfect, or secure it at all times from the influence of the passions, the prejudices, and wickedness, of those who might be intrusted with its administration.

It is considered undeniable that the plan of representative government—of conferring the law-making power upon delegates freely and fairly elected—is not only beneficial, but absolutely necessary, to the advancement of human happiness to the greatest attainable degree. It must be conceded, however, that this plan must unavoidably partake, in some degree, of the imperfections of human nature—must inevitably, at times, be exposed to partial or temporary evils. The maturest wisdom plainly dictates that it is far better to temper, to modify, to ameliorate, to counteract, these partial and temporary tendencies to evil, than to avoid their occurrence by a total abandonment of the system.

Has the institution of the qualified negative afforded the remedy for those occasional and temporary, but inherent, evils of a representative legislative body to which your committee have alluded? Or has its application, taking into view the whole period of the existence of the Federal Government, produced opposite evils, more durable and of greater magnitude? Has the exercise of this power, since the adoption of the federal constitution, been arbitrary, capricious, and altogether too frequent? Or has this power, upon the whole, been exerted to defend the people and the States against the bad effects of a legislative usurpation of powers belonging to other departments, as also against hasty, improvident, and unconstitutional enactments? The answer to these interrogatories will furnish a satisfactory solution of the problem, whether the principle of a qualified negative has been wisely and safely introduced into our federal system.

During the term of the present incumbent, this power has been exerted on several occasions of great moment; and your committee cannot doubt but that this circumstance has suggested, to those disapproving the conduct of the Executive in those instances, the proposed modification. It would be an improper consumption of time, and would extend this report to an unreasonable length, to engage in a discussion of the merits of these several applications of the "veto." They were subjects of protracted, animated, and able debate, before the common constituents of the Legislature and Executive. The multiplied developments of public sentiment cannot have failed to produce the conviction, on the mind of every candid and attentive observer of passing events, that, in all the various conflicts in relation to the "veto," the President has been fully sustained by the people, and by a majority of the States composing this confederacy.

Your committee, taking a cursory view of this portion of the history of the Federal Government, do not find any instance which they are prepared to condemn as a wanton or tyrannical display of this executive shield. They do not believe that its protection has been sought capriciously, or with too much frequency. Judging, therefore, from anterior occurrences, and looking to the future with an unjaundiced eye, no ground can be discovered upon which to rest the smallest apprehension of subsequent obstruction to wise legislation, or of a violation or suppression of the constitutional rights of Congress. Whilst it is true that "there are men who, under any circumstances, will have the courage to do their duty at every hazard," yet "the superior weight and influence of the legislative body, in a free Government, and the hazard to the Executive in a trial of strength with that body, afford a satisfactory security that the negative would generally be employed with great caution; and that, in its exercise, there would oftener be room for a charge of timidity than of rashness." From a careful examination of the arguments adduced, both in favor of the qualified negative and in opposition to it, your committee have drawn the conclusion that it is a wise, prudent, and salutary provision; and that the constitution, in this particular, should be permitted to rest undisturbed.

The next branch of the proposed amendment, in the estimation of your committee, aims a still more fatal blow at the independence and integrity of the Executive. The committee have most carefully examined it; they have bestowed on it that deliberate reflection which its importance and its novelty seemed to demand. In the language of the constitution, "the executive power is vested in a President of the United States of America." Congress may, and it is their duty to, enact any law which may be both necessary and proper, for carrying into execution the power vested in the President. The constitution authorizes the President to require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the executive departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices. The constitution, therefore, expressly authorizes "executive departments," and a "principal officer" in each; which "principal officers" are elsewhere denominated "heads of departments." These "executive departments," with their principal and inferior officers, were intended as auxiliaries to the President; to enable him, by a proper use of their labor and services, efficiently to exercise his powers, and faithfully to fulfil his duties. It could not have been intended to vest in them, either separately or aggregately, any part of the executive power; for this, as we have seen, "is vested in a President of the United States of America."

Congress may, as they have done, very properly pass laws to establish and organize the contemplated executive departments; but may not, without a palpable violation of the constitution, impart to any one, or to all, any portion of executive power. The framers of the constitution, by vesting the executive power solely in the President, have rejected the doctrine of the plurality, and have established that of the unity, of the Executive. Among the powers of the Executive, as settled at the very outset of the Government, is the appointment and removal of officers. The power of appointment is qualified; for it is the duty of the President to nominate, and then to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. So the treaty-making power belongs to the President; but, in its exercise, it is his duty to consult the Senate. There are instances in which the Executive is bound to consult one branch of the legislative body; and the refusal of their advice and consent prevents the performance of the intended act. They are not instances of a division of executive power, or of its joint exercise by the President and Senate. The want of advice and consent restrains and arrests the proposed action of the Executive; but restraint or check upon a given power is surely not a participation in its exercise. The qualified negative of the President is a check upon legislative power; but certainly the President is no part of the law-making power, which is vested in "a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." These distinctions are not nice metaphysical subtleties; they are plain and obvious, and are necessary to the preservation of the great principle laid down, in effect, in the constitution: that the Legislative and Executive shall be kept separate and distinct, so that neither exercise the powers properly belonging to the other.

Article 1st, section 1st, of the constitution, declares "all legislative power, herein granted, shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

Article 2d, section 1st, declares "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." These two sections, placed in juxtaposition, and viewed in contrast, fully show that a complete separation of the legislative and executive powers was designed. Each part of the constitution should be so construed as to give effect to the whole; and no construction should be countenanced, if it can be possibly avoided, which does violence to one of the great fundamental principles which the best writers on government consider, and have demonstrated to be, essential to a wise administration of delegated power; and, indeed, to the security of civil liberty. The power of removal from office, however, is unqualified: it may be exerted without the advice and consent of the Senate. The Treasury Department, as established and organized at the commencement of the Government, was considered to be one of the "executive departments" mentioned in the constitution, and has been so regarded ever since. If it be not an executive department, it is not known to or authorized by the constitution. It will not be pretended that it is a legislative or judicial department; if, therefore, it be not "executive," it is a nondescript, an exotic, and not of indigenous growth upon the soil of the constitution. From the foregoing views, your committee are justified in asserting, that there is unity in the Executive, and no division of its power; that the Treasury Department is an executive department; that the Secretary of the Treasury is consequently an executive officer, appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and removable by the President, without the advice and consent of the Senate. These are the settled principles of the constitution, with which the practice of the Government has conformed from its establishment to the present time.

It is now proposed, by an amendment, or rather by an alteration of the constitution, to change the present mode of appointing the Secretary of the Treasury to that of an annual election by joint vote of the two Houses of Congress; and, also, to divest the President of that part of the executive power which may be exerted in relation to revenue laws and revenue officers, and to vest the same in the Secretary of the Treasury. It is a proposition, then, to divide the executive power between the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. The idea of dividing executive power—of giving one portion separately and independently to one officer, and another portion separately and independently to another officer—is believed to be purely novel. The examination which your committee have had time to make has not enabled them to learn that this principle has ever been introduced into the Government of any civilized nation. Whilst, therefore, it surely comes to us with all the attractions which novelty may give it, yet it cannot claim any veneration or respect from its antiquity, or pretend that its utility and wisdom have been tested by experience. About the time of the formation of the constitutions of the old States, and of the adoption of the present federal constitution, there was some division of opinion, and much discussion, as to the merits of a single and plural Executive. An eminent writer has remarked that "unity may be destroyed in two ways—either by vesting the power in two or more magistrates of equal dignity and authority, or by vesting it ostensibly in one man; subject, in whole or in part, to the control and co-operation of others, in the capacity of counsellors to him. Of the first, the two Consuls of Rome may serve as an example; of the last, we shall find examples in the constitutions of several of the States."

In both the modes designated, the unity of the Executive may be destroyed, but in neither instance is there a partition of executive power. A superficial reference to Roman history, in the time of the Consuls, might induce the belief that the executive power was divided; it is, however, not so. The Consuls were executive officers, with joint and equal power; but either, in the absence of the other, might exercise the executive power singly. Hence, by consent, they often divided the Government. One governed Rome and its environs, the other governed one or more of the provinces; yet the executive power was not divided, for each, within his limits, exercised the whole executive power. Your committee repeat that they can find no precedent in ancient or modern times. Unable, therefore, to derive any advantage from historical research on this subject, they can only consult the dictates of common sense and sober judgment. Your committee are of opinion that, in relation to the Federal Government particularly, every argument which may be urged against a plurality in the Executive applies with equal if not greater force against a disjointed Executive. No one of ordinary intelligence and candor can doubt the necessity of vigor and energy in the Executive. No one will question the great philosophical truth, that concentration promotes strength, and that diffusion or division impairs. Hence, if the executive power be diffused among a plurality, or divided among several, we must necessarily have a weak and inefficient Executive. And it has with strict propriety been remarked "that a feeble Executive implies a feeble execution of the Government; a feeble execution is but another phrase for a bad execution; and a Government ill executed, whatever it may be in theory, must be, in practice, a bad Government." Should this portion of executive power be taken from the President, and conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury—should the President be deprived of all communion with, and control over, "all officers whose principal duties consist either in collecting, or receiving, or in disbursing, or in keeping accounts concerning, the revenue, or any part thereof," how could he, in such a condition of things, with regard to the fiscal concerns of the United States, "from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient?" How could he "take care that the laws be faithfully executed?" In the practical administration of the Government, therefore, this proposed division of power would seem likely to produce the most pernicious effect. Only extend this principle of a division of executive power; apply it to each of the other departments; confide to the head of each department the entire control over the business allotted to it, independent of, and unconnected with, the President; almost the whole mass of executive power will then have been parcelled out to officers not chosen by the people, but the dependants of Congress; and thus the President will be rendered comparatively powerless and inefficient; confusion of business, distraction of councils, imbecility of administration, will be the natural and deplorable effects of division. The simplicity of our system will be lost in a variety and complication, incomprehensible to the plain sense of ordinary men. If your committee have succeeded, as they trust they have, in showing that the proposed division of executive power ought not to be incorporated into the constitution, then it might be considered superfluous to examine the proposed mode of appointment. It is, however, a fit occasion to suggest that the election annually of an executive officer, with extensive power and patronage, by Congress, might, in time, become a fruitful source of intrigue and corruption; and the consequent dependence of this officer upon Congress might, virtually, violate that sound principle of keeping separate and distinct the legislative and executive branches of the Government.

Upon the supposition that the Secretary of the Treasury, under the contemplated change of the constitution, was to be really and bona fide an independent executive officer, it has, nevertheless, been shown that the principle of division is in itself wrong, and cannot be sustained. But whilst it is readily conceded that, under the new arrangement, he would be independent of the President, it is, however, denied that he would be independent of the Legislature. It is a miserable solecism to pronounce that officer independent who is expressly made to depend annually, or oftener if needful, upon Congress, for his place and his compensation; he could not be other than a fawning creature of Congress, watching the indications of their inclinations for his guidance, rather than consulting his own dispassionate judgment. Should this constitutional alteration be effected, Congress will, practically and essentially, have absorbed a large share of executive power; and the sanction of this scheme will add another to the many proofs of the tendency, especially in free Governments, of the legislative to appropriate to itself some of the powers properly belonging to the other branches.

It will not escape the observation of a discerning public, that certain executive proceedings in relation to the deposit and custody of the moneys of the United States are, in all probability, the groundwork of this attempted innovation upon the settled principles of the constitution. A bare order issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, under the direction and with the approbation of the President, directing that the then Bank of the United States should be discontinued as the depository of the collected revenue of the country, and that, after a given time, the collectors and receivers should deposit it "elsewhere" for safe keeping, was seized upon as a suitable occasion for a concerted clamor throughout the Union, that the Treasury had been lawlessly violated, and that the union of the sword and purse, in the person of the President, menaced the liberties of the nation with immediate destruction. It is no part of the business of the committee to discuss, in this place, the propriety of the removal of a former head of the Treasury Department, or to examine the legality and expediency of the removal of the deposits; they have referred to these matters for the purpose of tracing to its true source this charge of a union of the sword and purse, which is used as a pretext for a radical alteration of the fundamental law. Should it be made manifest that this imputed union of the sword and purse is the creature of a vivid fancy, rather than a real existence, the argument which rests upon such an assumption will have been annihilated. What, let it be candidly inquired, constitutes a concentration of the power of the sword and purse in the hands of the same person? When an individual, either by gross usurpation, or by the unfortunate and ill-advised consent of the community, has attained the high prerogative of declaring war at his own mere will and caprice; of raising armies at his own pleasure to prosecute such war; of levying and collecting money by his own arbitrary edict, and of disbursing this extorted treasure at his own unlimited discretion; such an individual would combine in his own hands the power of the sword and purse. In such a state of things, the country would be under the rule of a tyrant; and revolution, of the most sanguinary kind, for the rescue of liberty from the rapacious grasp of despotism, would justly claim the approbation of men and angels. Looking, however, into the provisions of our constitution, and the practice of the Government under it, there can be seen no color for the charge of such an unholy connexion. The President cannot make war; for this power is expressly given to Congress. The President cannot raise armies, or build and man a navy: "to raise and support armies," "to provide and maintain a navy," are expressly embraced in the legislative power granted in the constitution, and vested in the Congress. The President cannot, in any form, or by any device, levy any tax or contribution upon his fellow-citizens:

Amendment of the Constitution.

"to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," to borrow money on the credit of the United States, are powers expressly conferred on Congress. The President cannot take and appropriate to his own use, or to others' uses, one cent of the revenues of the United States: "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." Not one dime, therefore, can be extracted from the public coffers, but with the approbation and by the direction of Congress, declared by law enacted for that purpose. The very compensation of the President and all the executive officers cannot be drawn from the Treasury "but in consequence of appropriations made by law." What pretext, then, can be found for the allegation that the Executive, as at present organized, holds in a single grasp the double and dangerous power of the sword and purse; and that, for the patriotic purpose of disconnecting them, it is necessary to introduce into our Government the novel and untried experiment of a division of the executive power between two or more separate, distinct, independent, and unconnected functionaries?

The execution of the laws for the collection, safe keeping, and disbursement, of the revenue, like the execution of other laws, appertains to the President, in whom the executive power is vested. But those who have most strenuously defended the true constitutional powers of the President from legislative encroachment have always and invariably admitted that the custody of the public money might with great propriety be regulated by law. Taking into view all the constitutional restrictions upon the subject of the revenue, your committee have not the sagacity to discern any valid reason for making the execution of these laws an exception to the general rule. The President is directly responsible for the faithful execution of all the laws. He cannot, like the King of Great Britain, shield himself from accountability under the specious pretence of the evil counsels of ministers. The heads of departments and the inferior executive officers are the agents and auxiliaries of the President, subject to his supervision and control, and liable to removal by him. He, is, therefore rightly held amenable for the employment of honesty, industry, and capacity, in these several departments. And whilst these officers are themselves impeachable, their accountability does not in any wise remove or impair that of the President. Liability to removal, upon an impeachment, as well as by order of the President, affords a double security for the prompt and faithful discharge of the public business. But these officers neither divide the executive power nor the executive responsibility.

The 14th article of the proposed amendment next presents itself for examination. It is in these words: "The tenure of all offices, except such as are specially provided for in the constitution, and the mode of removal from office, shall be regulated by Congress." Of what offices is the tenure provided by the constitution? The tenure or term of office is prescribed in the constitution, in the case of the President and Vice President, the judges of the Supreme and inferior courts, and also in the case of members of Congress. In all the other innumerable cases of offices of every kind, it is gravely asked that the tenure of office may depend on the legislative will. In addition to which, it is also asked that "the mode of removal from office shall be regulated by Congress." Besides the power of removal, which, it has been settled, attaches to the executive function, the 4th section of the 2d article prescribes: "The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." The last sentence of the 2d section of the 1st article gives to the House of Representatives "the sole power of impeachment." In the 3d section of the same article, "the sole power to try all impeachments" is given to the Senate. No good reason suggests itself to your committee in favor of a change of this apparently well-guarded mode of removal. It might be unsafe to empower Congress, without restraint, to adopt another and more summary mode. The power of regulating the tenure of office, and the mode of removal from office, might be the means of enabling Congress to draw within the vortex of its influence both executive and judicial officers. Under cover of the power of regulating the tenure of office, the heads of departments and inferior officers might be enabled to disregard the supervisory control of the President, and still continue in office in defiance of his wishes. Would it be just or reasonable to exact from the President a responsibility for the faithful discharge of the duties of officers who were, by the regulation of the tenure of their office, removed completely beyond his direction and influence? In the same degree that the power of the President is lopped off, in the same degree that the due subordination of inferior officers is not secured, in the same degree is the efficiency of the Executive impaired, and rendered incapable of a wise and vigorous administration; and in the same degree does not stern justice demand that the reins of accountability should be relaxed.

The last provision of the amendment under consideration makes a universal disqualification of members of Congress to any office, on the nomination of the President or Secretary of the Treasury, during the term of their office, and for two years next ensuing the expiration thereof. There might, perhaps, be some reason for this last provision, some propriety in its adoption, as an accompaniment of the preceding parts. But your committee, having expressed their disapprobation of all those, do not deem it important to recommend that as an independent amendment which was only designed as one consequent on others. Bad selections might sometimes be made, not only from among the members of Congress, but also from the great body of the citizens. Aware of the weakness of human nature, your committee will not assert that the desire of appointment to office by the Executive may not on some occasions influence the conduct of men in and out of Congress. Perhaps (and some of the committee incline to that opinion) the disqualification might be somewhat extended beyond the point already established in the constitution. In relation to some classes of offices, it might be wise to exclude members of Congress during the continuance of their membership; whilst, as to others, the President ought to be allowed the widest scope of nomination. Specification is unnecessary, as your committee consider it their duty to report on the propositions referred to them, and do not regard themselves at liberty to originate. They do not approve the universal disqualification contained in the proposition referred, nor do they perceive the reason of prolonging the disqualification for two years after the expiration of the term of service.

Your committee have now completed a cursory review of all parts of the proposition submitted to them. The committee have heretofore intimated a distinction between an alteration, or change of the constitution, and an amendment thereto. They do not desire, however, to be understood as denying that, under the general and comprehensive term of "amendments to the constitution," some of the features may be changed, altered, or abolished, and that new features or principles may be incorporated. The term "amendment" is applied to the whole constitutional compact, and not to an amendment or modification of an existing provision. They certainly meant not to insinuate that the constitution itself could limit or restrain the creative or extinguishing power of the sovereign parties to the compact. The parties to the compact may amend it, by repealing or expunging some provisions altogether, by the introduction of entire new principles, or by mere modifications of those already existing. But much greater caution and deliberation ought to be observed in making radical changes, or alterations, or additions, than in only amending, modifying, or perfecting, an existing provision. And your committee will here intimate that, in the latter case, amendments may very properly be proposed by Congress, two thirds of both Houses concurring, subject to ratification by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States; but that, in the former case, it might be a wiser and safer precaution for Congress, on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, to call a convention, as provided in the constitution, and amendments proposed in such convention should be submitted for ratification to conventions in the States, the concurrence of three fourths of which would be necessary. The suggestion of these precautions proceeds from the well-settled conviction that we ought not to change, alter, or abolish, any of the principles upon which the confederacy was originally based, for light and insufficient causes, or without due and solemn deliberation. Prudence dictates that we ought not to enter hastily upon new and untried experiments; that we ought not, by the introduction of novelties, to deprive ourselves of the advantage, not inconsiderable to any Government, of that veneration which antiquity throws around all institutions. Frequent changes will impair our belief in the wisdom of our ancestors, and our admiration of the patriotism and skill with which they formed the American confederacy.

If there be not cogent reasons, based upon the detection of defects by experience, the noble edifice erected by our revolutionary fathers ought not to be rashly pulled down. Our glorious federal constitution will soon have existed half a century, and will soon begin to be encircled with ancient renown; it should, therefore, be defended with persevering and resolute valor. It is a noble contrivance, which binds in happy union so many sovereign republics. It is a precious inheritance, which deserves our warmest thankfulness and our most vigilant preservation. Let it be destroyed—posterity will then have imitated the spendthrift, who, by acts of imprudence and folly, dissipates both his patrimony and his gratitude.

The following resolution is therefore respectfully submitted by the committee to the House:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to propose any of the aforesaid amendments to the Legislatures, or to conventions of the several States.

PROTECTION TO AMERICAN SEAMEN.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 2, 1837.

Mr. McKEON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the following resolution of the House of Representatives: "Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of repealing all laws authorizing protections to be issued to American seamen, and to inquire into the expediency of abolishing all fees for protections to seamen," made the following report:

A proposition to modify a system which has for years been incorporated with our commercial arrangements, and intimately united with the most important relations of this country, ought to excite more than ordinary attention. Deeply impressed with the momentous character of the inquiry submitted to them, the committee have endeavored to present an ample statement of the question. The practice of issuing protections has been sanctioned under a law of Congress passed on the 18th day of March, 1796, entitled "An act for the relief and protection of American seamen." The following abstract presents a view of its most important provisions: the 1st, 2d, and 3d sections relate to the appointment of agents in foreign countries, to take care of the rights of seamen who might be impressed. These sections were enacted for a limited period, and are now inoperative. By the fourth section, it is provided that the collector of every district shall keep a book or books, in which, at the request of any seaman, being a citizen of the United States of America, and producing proof of his citizenship, authenticated in the manner hereinafter directed, he shall enter the name of such seaman, and shall deliver to him a certificate in the following form, that is to say: "I, A B, collector of the district of D, do hereby certify that E F, an American seaman, aged — years, or thereabouts, of the height of — feet — inches, [describing the said seaman as particularly as may be,] has this day produced to me proof, in the manner directed in the act entitled 'An act for the relief and protection of American seamen'; and, pursuant to the said act, I do hereby certify that the said E F is a citizen of the United States of America. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal of office, this — day of —." And it shall be the duty of the collector aforesaid to file and preserve the proof of citizenship produced as aforesaid; and for each certificate, delivered as aforesaid, the said collector shall be entitled to receive from the seaman applying for the same the sum of twenty-five cents.

As a proposition has been offered to inquire into the expediency of repealing this statute, the inquiry should be made into the origin of the law; for what purpose it was enacted; and whether a state of circumstances exists which requires a continuance of its provisions. The simple examination of the law shows that it was passed in consequence of the impressment of our seamen. The history of the period at which it passed, and particularly the journal of the House; can be added to show that the system of protections arose out of this outrage. From the journal of the House it appears that, on the 20th May, 1794, a resolution was adopted appointing a committee to regulate the mode in which American seamen might be furnished with evidence of citizenship, for the purpose of protecting them against impressment in foreign service. — (House Journal, vol. 2, p. 170.) Mr. Murray, from that committee, reported a bill, and, on the 6th June, a debate took place on it, in a Committee of the Whole House. The committee rose, and, on the question of granting leave to sit again, it was decided in the negative. On the 9th June Congress adjourned, no further action having taken place on it. The debates of that day, as they appear on the public journals, show why Mr. Murray introduced the resolution. He referred, in his remarks in the introduction of the measure, to the fact, that when Great Britain armed against Spain, in the affair of Nootka Sound, our seamen had been impressed. He was of opinion that, if certificates were issued, no nation would attempt to molest them. The discussion on the bill was very animated. The measure was objected to, amongst other reasons, on the ground of its being an admission on our part that such seamen as might be without protections would be liable to impressment. The objections to the bill prevailed, and it was defeated. The subject was not permitted to sleep; the country became aroused by the enormities committed on our mariners by foreign Powers, and demanded some action. Mr. Livingston, on the 18th February, 1796, introduced a resolution to check the evil. In introducing the resolution, Mr. Livingston said: "He would call the attention of the House to the situation of a very important and meritorious class of men, whose value seemed to be overlooked, and whose dearest rights were either shamefully neglected, or ignominiously surrendered. He adverted to the seamen of the United States. This valuable class of men would fall under one of these descriptions:

- "1. Native American citizens.
- "2. Such as were citizens at the time of the declaration of independence, and at the period of the peace with Great Britain.

"3. Foreigners naturalized since the declaration of independence.

"It would be no difficult matter to prove that all the individuals of either of those descriptions were equally entitled to the protection of the Government, to the same or greater exertions in their favor, than were made for those citizens whose situations rendered it easier to apply for relief. Yet this meritorious body of our constituents, he said, thus entitled to our protection and favor, sailing under the sanction of our national flag, had been illegally seized, violently forced into a service they abhorred, cruelly torn from their relations, their families, and their country, and ignominiously scourged, for asserting the privileges of their citizenship. The country, to whom they looked for protection and relief, had regarded their sufferings with apathy and indifference. Three years we had beheld their miseries, and heard their cries for relief; yet for three years we had been silent spectators of this disgraceful scene.

"He concluded with moving the following resolution :

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire and report whether any, and what, legislative provision is necessary for the relief of such American seamen as may have been impressed into the service of any foreign Power; and, also, to report a mode of furnishing American seamen with such evidence of their citizenship as may protect them from foreign impressment in future.

"Ordered to lie on the table."

On the succeeding day the resolution was adopted without "opposition, and a committee appointed in obedience to it, consisting of Mr. Livingston, Mr. Bourne, Mr. Swanwick, Mr. Samuel Smith, and Mr. William Smith. On the 21st of February, Mr. Livingston made a report, which was debated in a Committee of the Whole, and the following resolutions agreed to :

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made for the support of two or more agents, to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the one of which agents shall reside in the Kingdom of Great Britain, and the others at such places as the President may direct, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the situation of such American citizens as shall have been, or may hereafter be, impressed or detained on board any foreign vessel, to endeavor by all legal means to obtain their release, and to render an account of all foreign impressments of American citizens to the Government of the United States.

"Resolved, That proper offices ought to be provided, where every seaman, being a citizen of the United States, on producing evidence, duly authenticated, of his birth, naturalization, or residence within the United States, and under their protection, on the third day of September, 1783, may have such evidence registered, and may receive a certificate of his citizenship.

"Resolved, That a bill or bills be brought in, in pursuance of the said resolutions, and Mr. Livingston, Mr. Bourne, Mr. Swanwick, Mr. Samuel Smith, and Mr. William Smith, do prepare and bring in the same."

Mr. Livingston, from the committee, reported a bill, which, after a violent debate, was passed. An ineffectual effort was made to recommit it. The bill passed by a vote of 77 in the affirmative, and 13 in the negative. In the Senate the bill met also with opposition—amendments were made; the House agreed to some, and rejected others; a committee of conference was appointed, and, after consultation, the Senate receded from the amendments objected to by the House. The bill finally passed, and was approved by the President on the 28th day of May, 1796. From the debate which took place, it is evident that the law was produced by the violations which were daily committed on the rights of our seamen. The opposition to the law was chiefly founded on the want of sufficient proof that our citizens had been seized. To this it was answered, ed, that the seizures were so notorious that the committee to which the subject was referred had not deemed it necessary to enumerate the cases. Every paper was filled with accounts of the capture of our seamen. The British Government, while insisting on the right of taking natives of Great Britain, wherever found, not only seized their own citizens, but also Americans. That, in consequence of the similarity of language and appearance, they might mistake our citizens for citizens of Great Britain; and, to provide our seamen with evidence of their citizenship, the law was proposed to be passed.

This sketch of the history of the law is given to show from what causes sprang this species of legislation. The period at which it originated was peculiar. While the European Powers were engaged in a tremendous struggle, the influences of which were felt in every quarter of the world, the United States was pursuing a policy secured to them by the law of nations, and one which displayed their anxiety to preserve a strict neutrality. One of the belligerent Powers, anxious to obtain all the means within her reach to prosecute a maritime war with success, insisted on the right to board neutral vessels, and take from them such seamen as might have been born within the dominions of the King of Great Britain. In vain were our remonstrances made against this practice. At the period to which we allude, our country had but just emerged from the troubles of our revolutionary contest. She was feeble, and without a naval force. She was willing to remove from foreign Powers any pretext for seizing our citizens on the ground of similarity of language and appearance with those of Great Britain, and for this purpose provided the system of protections. Notwithstanding this movement, the practice was not abandoned, nor was the protection system respected in any manner by Great Britain. This was evident, not only from the declarations but the acts of that nation. The British minister to the United States, Mr. Liston, in the year 1800, in writing to the Secretary of State, remarks: "I cannot omit this opportunity of recalling to your remembrance what I have frequently stated in conversation, that while the papers called protections are granted with fraudulent intention, or without a proper examination of facts, by inferior magistrates, or notaries public, in the United States, and while they can easily be procured by such natural-born subjects of his Majesty as choose to abandon his service in the hour of danger, it is not expected that any regard will be paid to them by his commanders of British ships of war." Not only in the communications with this Government, but in the proclamations issued by the British Government to the commanders of vessels, objection was made to the protections. Years had elapsed after the passage of our law; full notice had been given to Great Britain of its existence; and yet, in one of the proclamations, issue is directly joined with that system. Notice was therein given that those who had those certificates should not be exempt from impressment. All natural-born subjects of the King could not divest themselves of their allegiance, and were informed "that no such letters or certificates do or can, in any manner, divest our (the King's) natural-born subjects of the allegiance, or in any degree alter the duty, which they owe to us, their lawful sovereign." (Proclamation, Oct. 16, 1807.) Not only are we in possession of the declarations of that Government, in opposition to the value of those documents, but we have also the fact that, after the passage of the law, thousands of seamen, armed with the protections, were seized on board of American vessels. The ground assumed by those who impressed them was, that the papers were forgeries; that the King had a right to the services of his natural-born subjects, and that it was difficult to distinguish Americans from natural-born Englishmen. But not only were English and Americans impressed, but Swedes, Danes, and natives of other countries, who could not be mistaken for natives of Great Britain. Every officer boarding one of our vessels was made the judge of the genuineness of the protection, and of the fact of citizenship. The prisons of Great Britain can prove that our seamen were confined, even when they held the protections. Amongst the causes which produced the war between this country and England; the impressment of our seamen bore a conspicuous place. It was well known that thousands had been seized while sailing under our flag, and with the protections in their possession.

At the conclusion of the contest, which brought so great glory to the American arms on land, and evinced the power of the United States to claim equality on the ocean, the question of impressment was proposed to be made the subject of the treaty of Ghent. It was not acted upon; but, as yet, remains undetermined between us and Great Britain, the only Government which insists upon this right of impressment. It is evident that the protection system never answered the purpose for which it was intended by its authors. It was not respected by the Government of Great Britain; it was not respected by any of its agents; still our seamen, as a general rule, were compelled to submit to the expense of the documents, and then to find the paper utterly impotent. The system was strenuously objected to by many of our leading statesmen. Mr. Jefferson was the first to raise his voice against the proposition. Before the passage of the law, his opinion was recorded in opposition to the measure. That distinguished statesman, in June, 1792, was Secretary of State, and, in writing to Mr. Pinckney, minister plenipotentiary of the United States at London, remarked, "that the peculiar custom of England, in impressing seamen on every appearance of war, will occasionally expose our seamen to peculiar oppressions and vexations. It will be expedient that you take proper opportunities in the mean time of conferring with the minister on this subject, in order to form some arrangement for the protection of our seamen on these occasions. We entirely regret the mode which was the subject of conversation between Mr. Morris and him; which was, that our seamen should always carry about them certificates of citizenship. This is a condition never yet submitted to by any nation; one with which seamen would never have occasion to comply; the casualties of their calling would expose them to the constant destruction or loss of this paper evidence, and thus the British Government would be armed with legal authority to impress the whole of our seamen. The simplest rule will be, that the vessel being American, shall be evidence that the seamen on board are such." This letter of Mr. Jefferson was long before the passage of the law now proposed to be repealed. After its passage, Mr. Pinckney, then Secretary of State, wrote, in June, 1796, to Mr. King, referring to the instructions given to Mr. Pinckney in June, 1792. He says: "You will see, referring to Mr. Jefferson's letter to Mr. Pinckney, that the mode prescribed in the late act of Congress, of certifying our seamen, was pointedly reprobated. The simplest rule, as remarked to Mr. Pinckney, would be, that the vessel being American should be evidence that the seamen on board her are such. But it will be an important point gained, if on the high seas our flag can protect those, of whatever nation, who shall sail under it. And for this, humanity, as well as interest, powerfully plead. Merchant vessels carry no more hands than their safety renders necessary; to withdraw any of them on the ocean is to expose both lives and property to certain destruction." Speaking of the protections under the act of 1796, he says, "that sailors will often lose their certificates, and provision should be made for other proof of their citizenship, such as their own oaths, with those of master's mates, or other creditable witnesses. The rolls of the crew, or shipping papers, may also be authenticated by the collectors of the customs, and then they ought to be admitted as of equal validity with the individual certificates." The opinions here advanced contain the true principles on which we should act. The sentiments of the statesman to whom reference is made reflect the opinions of the present day. On reference to the commercial systems of the various maritime Powers, no provision similar to our system of protections can be discovered. In Spain, every individual who desires to become a sailor is enrolled in the district to which he belongs, and a certificate given him. He is liable to be called into the public service for a number of years, and at the expiration of the service to enjoy certain privileges. It has been supposed that the certificate was for the same purpose with our protection. It is evident that it was never intended for the same object. Our document was intended to be produced on the high seas. The Spanish certificate was adopted for the purpose of being effective within the Spanish territories. Other nations have also certificates, intended to operate only within their respective territories. It is believed that no nation can be found which has been willing to follow the system introduced by the United States. It may be argued that in consequence of the resemblance in manners, appearance, and language, we are the only people exposed to the rule of the British Government—that rule of insisting on impressment. The fact of our issuing protections to avoid such a difficulty is making a concession which no sovereign Power ought to make to another. But it is well known that naturalized citizens of the United States, who had been born in Sweden, and other parts of the continent, and who could not have been mistaken for natives of Great Britain, were seized by her officers. Instead of legislating in the manner we have legislated, ought we not to stand upon the broad ground of the law of nations? Ought we not, in fact, appear in our intercourse with the world one "of the equal and independent nations of the earth?" Can we present that character so long as we have remaining on our laws a provision which shows that we have been willing to do more than is required by the laws of nations, and that we are still willing to allow that anomalous provision to remain in full operation? Is it not due to the character of the country that we should now, when we have arrived at strength and are possessed of resources of vast extent, stand erect, untrammelled with legislation which was yielded in the days of our infancy and weakness, and when from our situation we were compelled to make concessions to those Powers that had no right, but had the means, of enforcing their demands upon us? The flag of the country has fought its way to the respect of the world, and ought now to cover those who sail under it. The United States ought not to acquiesce in any rule which even throws a suspicion upon their full equality on the ocean. The brilliant naval victories of the late war are evidence of the capacity of our seamen to maintain their rights, and it does not become this Government to require of them to be provided upon the ocean with any other documents than seamen of other countries. Is it not degrading to our citizens that they are bound to have a document which is unusual, unsanctioned by the law of nations, and reminds them at the same time that it grew out of the fact of our country not being able to maintain her flag? Is it creditable to us as a nation, that upon the high seas, where the vessels of all nations meet as equals, that our sailors have been requested by our Government, since 1796, to provide themselves with paper evidence of their American character? Every other nation deems the flag of the country sufficient protection, but we insist upon a proof, which we submit to exhibit to any foreign Power whose officer may board our vessels.

Many object to the repeal of the act, on the ground that it assimilates to a passport, which is granted to every citizen when he leaves this country; that it operates in the same manner; that it is serviceable to the sailor in his intercourse with our foreign consuls. It must be evident that the system of protections was not introduced for the purpose of being operative within the territories of a foreign Power, where passports are useful, but only on the high seas. They who object ought to consider that no maritime Power gives its citizens evidences to show on the high seas the fact of their allegiance. None of the numerous crews of foreign vessels which enter our ports, or the ports of Great Britain or France, except American seamen, have any evidences of this nature. If, however, it be deemed advisable to grant our seamen evidences of any kind, let them be taken out in the same manner with other citizens, and let them not be compelled to take their evidence under a law which was intended to operate only on the high seas. Under our laws, the protection is, even to our consuls, not the sole evidence of the fact of citizenship. If an American sailor is without a protection, it is not evidence sufficient to justify the consul to refuse giving him aid. If, by any reasonable mode, he can discover the fact of his being an American seaman, he is bound, even if unprovided with a protection, to afford the seaman relief, if he be in distress.

From the abuses which grow out of these papers, many complaints have been made by our consuls. If our foreign agents are bound to obey these documents, without question, it is evident that gross frauds may be committed upon them. From experience, it has been settled that our consuls have advised the repeal of the protection law. Mr. Stewart, who was in the consulate in London in 1815 and 1816, gave his opinion in favor of the repeal of the protection system. He stated the facility with which they were procured tended in a great measure to render it useless. "It would, in my opinion," he writes, in 1817, to Mr. Forsyth, then at the head of the Committee on Foreign Relations, "be much better to repeal the law on that subject, in preference to its remaining on the present footing." He was satisfied of the frauds that were practised, and of the inutility of the document. As the law now stands, if a sailor should find it necessary to have a certificate of citizenship, he can always apply to our consuls when in a foreign port. They are fully authorized to grant them, and are liable to a fine if they knowingly grant them to any but citizens. Mr. Dodge, our consul at Bremen, in a letter full of information on this and other subjects, addressed to one of the Committee on Commerce, gives the following opinion on this point:

"The system of custom-house protections to our seamen has never, in my humble opinion, answered the purpose for which they were granted: said protections were for the protection of American seamen from impressment by the British. It must be well known to many of our mercantile community, conversant with the events preceding our last war with that country, that in thousands of cases where a British officer boarded one of our merchant vessels, that if the man-of-war wanted hands, and the officer found such on board the American vessel as, by their seamanlike appearance, would answer his purpose, he was sure to take them, whether they had protections or not."

Mr. Dodge then states the facilities with which frauds are committed, and the inducements which are held out under the system. At the same time he suggests the propriety of giving to seamen a document, in the nature of a passport, to be useful to him in a foreign country. In Mr. Dodge's opinion, the role d'equipage ought to be sufficient protection on the high seas.

Mr. Dana, in 1813, reported to the Senate a system of navigation for the United States. It arose out of the suggestion in the President's message, to confine the American navigation to American seamen. The report states that the bill submitted by the committee proposed to allow the privileges of an American character to none but vessels navigated by American mariners. The law may require means to provide for ascertaining who shall be regarded as mariners, and to make it requisite for vessels of the United States to have documents on board as evidence of being so navigated.

At the conclusion of the report, it is stated that the documents for vessels sailing on foreign voyages may suspend the use of any other certificate of citizenship for persons employed in navigating them; and it is proposed to repeal the section of the act of May, 1796, which has authorized collectors to deliver certificates to individual mariners. Abuses which are known to have prevailed in relation to such certificates may be avoided by requiring proper documents to accompany the vessels. The law of 1796, as at present understood and administered, it is well known, gives great room to frauds and exactions. The protections are considered absolutely necessary by our seamen. That class of our citizens supposes that the law compels them to take out the document. Notwithstanding the law makes it a voluntary act to take a protection, yet, as the practice has become general amongst our vessels of insisting on it, our seamen submit to the trouble and expense. The form of expression in the law makes it optional with the seaman. The collector is bound to deliver protections to only those who desire it. The words of the law are, "at the request of any seaman, being a citizen of the United States." The intention of the law was to give the sailor, if he thought it of any service, evidence of his citizenship. A general impression exists, among our maritime people, that a legal necessity exists on the part of the seaman to be provided with the protection. The sole purpose of the paper was to give to a foreign Power, insisting on the right of impressment, evidence that the bearer of the document was an American citizen, and, by the law of nations, exempt from impressment. In a state of peace, it is more manifest that it cannot be of any advantage; yet the result of the impression alluded to is, that every sailor provides himself with the document.

It is easily lost, and the probability is, that it is frequently renewed at an expense to the seaman. The fee exacted by the law is twenty-five cents at the custom-house, but, with the charge of notary, it is understood to be a charge to the applicant of about one dollar and twenty-five cents. One of the officers of the revenue says that "by repealing the fees for protections you would reduce the expense of the seamen to one fifth or one ninth of what they are now at to procure these protections. The persons from whom, in some of our ports, they obtain protections, make money out of them. They frequently collect the protections of the seamen, and hand them over to the captains, as some kind of lien that the seamen will go with them, and not leave them in a foreign port; and whenever they quit the employ, their protections are generally left, and new ones are to be obtained when they go to sea again." From the returns which have been made annually to the Department of State, under the law of 1796, which requires a return of the number of seamen registered as protected, it appears that large numbers are registered, at an expense of many thousands of dollars. It is manifest that the withdrawal of that amount was wholly unnecessary, and peculiarly oppressive, on the part of the Government, upon a class of our citizens whose labors are of a character exposing them to toils and dangers of no ordinary nature, and should shield them from such severe exactions of the Government under which they live. Whether it shall be deemed proper to repeal the whole of the provisions relating to this subject, there cannot be a doubt as to the propriety of destroying that part of the law which imposes fees on the issuing of the certificates. Already the seamen are burdened sufficiently with taxation, and have strong claims on the Government for a release from the oppression. The passports which are issued from the State Department to persons about to travel in foreign countries are delivered gratuitously to applicants; and there cannot be any reason why our seamen should be compelled to pay for their certificates of citizenship, more than any other class of our citizens.

It is a well-settled principle of international law, and maintained by all our statesmen, that "over the individuals and property within the limits of a sovereign State, the laws of that State have control and owe protection." The vessels of every nation are part of its property; she regulates them while within her ports, and all acts committed, and contracts entered into, while on the high seas, are referred to the tribunals of the courts of that nation whose flag the vessel may bear. In the language of Kluber, a merchant vessel ought to be considered as a floating colony of her State. The flag of the nation protects all who are beneath it. There is no doubt of the impropriety of granting certificates to our own inhabitants, while within our own territories, and yet we preserve a law which makes provision for a document, as unnecessary, under the law of nations, as any document of the same kind would be to any of our inhabitants within his own home. Not more sacred should be the home of the landsman than the vessel of the mariner in that respect. Both are equally entitled to the protection of the Government, and one ought not to be burdened with the evidence of his citizenship more than the other; more especially as the protection is the evidence of our weakness in the earlier age of the nation. The practice of impressment was adopted by Great Britain when she was engaged in the naval gigantic wars which have ever disturbed the peace of the world. She insisted that, under an imprescriptible custom, the King had a right to the services of all his subjects, and that any nation which employed them exposed their vessels to the search of the British vessels of war. In no treaty, or in any work upon the law of nations, can any authority be found for such a practice. Lord Castlereagh put it on the common-law right of the King to command the services of his subjects, and that the allegiance which was due from a native citizen never could be shaken off. The consequence of this position, as asserted by our statesmen, must be that every municipal law, every regulation which might operate within the territories of a nation, must be binding upon all other nations at sea. The inevitable result might be, that, if a nation thought proper to make regulations with regard to certain articles, (not even contraband of war), and make them liable to seizure on board of a vessel bearing a neutral flag, that those neutral vessels must submit not only to search, but to seizure and to confiscation on the high seas.

A retrospect of the course pursued by this country will show with what zeal the statesmen who have been engaged in carrying on the foreign negotiations of this country have sustained the cause of the freedom of the seas, of the rights of neutrals, of the want of authority to sustain the practice of impressment, and, above all, the ability with which they have insisted on the power of the flag to be the axis of protection of American seamen, and American property, on the high seas. Mr. Madison in 1806, in writing to Mr. Monroe, then in London, examined the whole question of impressment. He insisted that a neutral flag, on the high seas, should be a safeguard to those sailing it. He assumes the position that, under the law of nations, the right of searching for, and seizing on, subjects of foreign countries, except those in the military service of a country, does not exist. That justice and virtue forbid the exercise of a right which gives to an officer of a vessel the power of determining on the rights of a citizen, without even the forms of a trial, which is secured under the code of civilized nations to the enrolled amount of property. Speaking of the protection, he says: "That the certificate called a protection to American seamen is not meant to protect them under their own, or even any other neutral flag, on the high seas." He can never admit that, in such situations, any other protection is required for them than the neutral flag itself on the high seas. He says "that the protection is given to be useful to them within the jurisdiction of foreign Powers."

Great Britain, in 1803, by her ministers, yielded in full this great point. *Lord Hawkesbury, the Secretary of State, in fact, admitted the rights of our flag, by assenting to Mr. King's proposition forbidding impressment on the high seas. Lord St. Vincent, First Lord of the Admiralty, also assented, but afterwards, on consultation with Sir William Scott, an exception in favor of the narrow seas was inserted. This exception was wholly untenable. The exclusive jurisdiction of Great Britain did not extend to those seas. Her claim was of no higher value than that of any other nation. Her only pretext was the common-law claim of the sovereign to the services of his subjects, at all times and places. Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, writing to our plenipotentiaries for treating of peace, (April 15, 1813,) stated that our Government had passed a law on the subject of seamen. By that law, no British subject could be engaged as a seaman on board of our vessels, private or public, without producing to the collector, or commander of the vessel, a certified copy of the act by which he was naturalized. Five years' continued residence was required as a condition precedent to citizenship. After naturalization, he remarked that the native and adopted citizen stood on the same footing by our laws. Of the right to be exempt from impressment, he insisted that the practice was utterly repugnant to the law of nations, as unsupported by any treaty with any nation, never was acquiesced in by any, and that a submission to it seemed to be sacrificing the natural rights of the United States. Mr. Adams, in 1816, had an interview with Lord Castlereagh on the subject of the impressment of our seamen. Mr. Adams, anxious to obtain some settlement of the question on honorable terms, pointed out to Lord Castlereagh the measure of Congress restricting our vessels to citizens of the United States. It was evident, from the remarks of Castlereagh, that from the passage of that law he adduced an argument against any stipulation on the part of the Government of Great Britain. He remarked, that if our law was carried out, there would be no seamen on board of American vessels to take, and the practice of taking them would cease of course. Mr. Adams, in his communication to the Secretary of State, properly observes "that the practice will not be tolerated by a nation of the strength and resources to which the United States are rising. It cannot be too forcibly urged upon their conviction, that the only means of protecting their seafaring men will consist in the energy with which their rights shall be asserted."

Mr. Adams, in 1818, in writing to Messrs. Gallatin and Rush, then in London, on the subject of a proposition which had been made to enter into some arrangement as to impressments, remarked: "The second proposal (that British officers entering our vessels, for purposes warranted by the laws of nations, should be authorized to call for the list of the crew; and if they should find, or suspect, an Englishman to be on board, to make a record of the fact, for the purpose of remonstrance to the Government of the United States) is, in the view of the President, still more objectionable. In the first place, the distrust that it implies that the law for excluding British seamen will, though stipulated, not be faithfully executed, is not warranted by any experience, nor can this Government give countenance to it by assenting to any stipulation which could be considered as resulting from it." He then states: "It was not expressly asked by Lord Castlereagh in his proposal, as reported by Mr. Rush, that the officer, in calling for the shipping papers, should also have the power of mustering the crew, to examine them, by comparison, with the list; but, as the mere view of the list would be useless, unless coupled with that power, we consider it as having been intended to have been included in the proposal. And this very inspection of the crews of our vessels by a foreign officer has been found among the most grievous and insulting aggravations of the practice of impressment. The tendency, he insists, would be to produce altercation between commanders. The suspected seamen must have a right as well as the suspecting officer. There would be no tribunal to judge between them, and the consequent cause of collision between the two nations;" and yet has not the protection system been yielding these very points? Do we not make our seamen offer themselves to be examined? Is not the practice open to all the objections advanced with such force and ability by the Secretary of State?

Destined as this country is to maintain a high rank amongst the maritime nations of the world, it becomes it to occupy that position, with regard to the high seas, which will not, in any way, affect the great principles of international law. In all our foreign policy, we have endeavored to enlarge the charities of the law of nations: to insist upon the strictest rules with reference to a state of war, and to carry out the principle that in that state belligerents ought not to interfere with the rights of neutrals, so long as they do not aid, in any manner, either of the hostile parties. The commerce of this country is seeking every ocean; our seamen are exposed at every point; and it is questionable whether, by having upon our statute book a law which admits that protection to our seamen may be useful, and even necessary, we are not inviting a principle which, by course of time, may operate to the disadvantage of our seamen. We ought to inquire, what papers are necessary under the law of nations? As part of the civilized portion of the world, bound by that code, we should conform to its regulations, but should not go beyond them. What are the documents required?

1. The passport, sea brief, or sea letter.—This is a permission from the neutral State to the captain or master of the ship to proceed on the voyage proposed, and usually contains his name and residence; the name, property, description, tonnage, and destination, of the ship; the nature and quantity of the cargo; the place from whence it comes, and its destination, with such other matters as the practice of the place requires.

2. The proofs of property.—These ought to show that the ship really belongs to the subjects of a neutral State; (this is shown by our register.) If she appear to be either belligerent or to have been built in the enemy's country, proof is generally required that she was purchased by the neutral before, or captured, and legally condemned, and sold to the neutral, after the declaration of war; and, in the latter case, the bills of sale, properly authenticated, ought to be produced.

3. The muster roll.—This, which the French call role d'équipage, contains the names, ages, quality, place of residence, and, above all, the place of birth, of every person of the ship's company. This document is of great use in ascertaining a ship's neutrality.

4. The charter party.—When the ship is chartered, this instrument serves to authenticate many of the facts on which the truth of her neutrality must rest, and should therefore be always found on board chartered ships.

5. The bills of lading.—By these, the captain acknowledges the receipt of the goods specified therein, and promises to deliver them to the consignee or his order.

6. The invoices.—These contain the particulars and prices of each parcel of goods, with the amount of the freight, duties, and other charges thereon, which are usually transmitted from the shippers to their factors or consignees.

7. The log book or ship's journal.—This contains a minute account of the ship's course, with a short history of every occurrence during the voyage.

8. The bill of health.—This is a certificate, properly authenticated, that the ship comes from a place where no contagious distemper prevails; and that none of the crew, at the time of her departure, were infected with any such disorder. These documents are, on reference, found to be important and necessary. When a vessel of the United States is found with these documents, nothing more can be required of her, and any legislation which admits the necessity of further proof must be tolerated at the sacrifice of that equality which we should maintain with the other neutral Powers of the world.

The great principle of the inviolability of a neutral flag is one in which this country, as a commercial nation, is deeply interested. No position which yields the principle that the high seas are not common to all, that on the ocean one Power has authority over another, can ever be acquiesced in. Desirous as we must be of maintaining the rights of neutrals, we ought never to contract the already limited privileges they enjoy under the law of nations. From our character as a nation, from the policy which ought to distinguish our movements, it is expected that we should not be disposed to submit to shackles which would tend to derogate from our character, and expose our seamen to investigations and trials unknown to the seamen of every other country. While we admit that the right of search during a state of war exists, we can go no farther than to say that it is the duty of the master of a vessel to produce his documents to support his neutral character, and that those documents are the register, the passport, sea letter, muster roll, log book, charter party, invoice, and bill of lading. These papers are the extent to which a belligerent can go; but under no part of international law can particular protections be demanded for the individuals on board of the vessel. The role d'équipage contains all that, under the law of nations, can be demanded as to the ship's company; and to acquiesce in that rule, and to advance no further, ought to be the present policy of the United States.

Upon a review of the circumstances under which the law of 1796 was passed, it cannot but be believed that the period has passed when it was necessary to continue the present law. It is evident that, during a time when the maritime nations of the world are at peace, it is useless; that its existence renders the opinion prevalent that a necessity exists for obtaining protections; and that if difficulty should again occur, this legislation might be adduced in a manner disadvantageous to our interests, and prejudicial to the glory and national elevation of the country. The period which found us without a navy, and encumbered with debt, has passed away; and with that period ought to vanish the legislation which was the consequence of that situation. The present period is peculiarly auspicious to proclaim the principle that the flag of the Union shall be the protection of those who tread the deck of an American vessel. The repeal of this law cannot in any manner affect our relations with foreign Powers. But one nation has insisted on the right of impressment, and this she has only exercised when engaged in naval warfare with other nations. At a period when she is at peace it is proposed to repeal it; and there can be but little doubt that, with the sincere feeling of amity which exists between the two countries, some arrangement may be entered into whereby this subject may be disposed of to the advantage of both parties. Not only the great interests which connect us, but also the common language which binds us, and the dictates of reason, of humanity, and sound policy, ought to induce an amicable and happy adjustment of this disturbing point. In the kind office which, within the last year, that Government proffered its services, may be seen the best evidence of its feelings towards this country; and we cannot but indulge the hope that the same spirit may be continued, until it shall remove every trace of a question which has heretofore been a point of difference.

The result of an examination of the questions submitted must lead to the conclusion that the law of 1796 ought not to remain upon our statute book; because it has not answered the original purpose of its framers, and preserves a system unknown to the maritime nations of the world.

It has introduced a regulation productive of frauds. It places our seamen under an obligation to obtain documents wholly useless, and at the same time expensive. It is objected to by the most prominent statesmen in the nation, and in the opinion of our public agents unnecessary.

It has been, and might be, claimed as an admission of the right, put forward by Great Britain, to seize all our seamen who have not the protections.

The interests of the nation require that the rights of neutrals should be maintained, and the honor of the country demands that the flag of the country shall be inviolate, and the only protection of those who place themselves under it.

In accordance with the suggestions of some of our public agents, it has been deemed not improper to grant to our seamen a document which will, in a foreign land, afford them evidence of their citizenship, and at the same time entitle them, under our own laws, to certain advantages. A law which shall place our seamen on a footing with the rest of our citizens passing into foreign countries, and who now procure passports, may not be open to objections, particularly to those made to protections; while, at the same time, the passport might have some effect with our consuls and the officers of customs. It is proposed to direct the Secretary of State to transmit to the collectors passports, in the same manner that the Treasury Department now transmits registers of vessels. No passport to be issued unless signed by the collector. At our custom-houses, proper officers will examine our citizens, and deliver the passport to those who may wish to obtain the document.

Under the law of March 3, 1813, "for the regulation of seamen on board the public and private vessels of the United States," the President can make and promulgate regulations as to the mode of obtaining evidence of citizenship. The main object will be to grant to the mariner who desires it this evidence of his being an American citizen, in the same manner with other citizens, and to relieve the sailor of a tax which he is now subjected to. A bill embracing these points is herewith submitted.

Whether the House, at the present session, will decide upon the question, or not, the committee are satisfied that the subject is one which ought to be brought to the attention of the country. A description of its merits will bring forth the opinions of the nation on a point of vital importance to the welfare of a highly meritorious and useful portion of our citizens, and a matter particularly interesting to the country, when viewed in connexion with our national character and independence.

HARBORS AND RIVERS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 31, 1837.

Mr. Smith, of Maine, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made the following report:

The Committee of Ways and Means submitted to the House of Representatives, at the last session of Congress, a report explanatory of the unproductive yet growing expenditures of the Government upon harbors and rivers, and expressive of serious doubts of the policy of following out this branch of the public service, unless some more certain and efficient and economical system for conducting it could be devised. The experience of another year upon the subject, written out in the progress reported as having been made in the several works of the denomination mentioned during that period, and in the estimates submitted for their continuance, in no degree alters the conclusion of the committee, expressed in their before-named report, that "the system is expensive, and yet feeble; flattering, and yet uncertain, in all its operations and results, unless it be viewed only with reference to its fitness to the purposes of the individual wealth and profit of the agents and contractors immediately concerned." The bill submitted to the House by the committee at the last session, entitled "A bill directing the Secretary of War to report annually certain information relating to works of internal improvement," and still pending before the House, is believed to be well calculated to secure to the Government much needful and useful information respecting this branch of expenditures, and not heretofore reported to the Engineer department. And it is due to the principal officer of that department to say that the suggestions of that bill have been, in the main, adopted and enforced by him during the past year upon the officers and agents who superintended the public works under him, and the advantages of this course are already beginning to be realized. But, notwithstanding the great additional responsibility and accountability, on the part of subordinates, thus imparted to this branch of expenditures, the great and inherent evils of the system, expanded as it has been, have not been cured, and are perhaps incurable. At all events, they must probably be borne until Congress shall resolve to confine the operations of the Government to such improvements as are of the first magnitude, and of urgent necessity to the commerce of the lakes and seaboard, and to leave those of a secondary and still less important order to be accomplished by the energies of the State Governments, which can better appreciate the utility of them, or to individual enterprise. It is not easily seen why individual wealth and enterprise may not combine and direct their efforts to the execution of such works of general benefit upon the shores of our interior lakes, and upon the margins of rivers susceptible of improvement, and which fall short of national importance, and derive such remuneration from their use as is awarded to capital invested in other works of public and local utility—say turnpikes, bridges, locks, and canals. Without some curtailment by Congress of the class of works already projected as recipients of its bounty, and without a decisive limitation of its appropriations to works that may justly be denominated of the first magnitude, and of imperious necessity too, it requires no spirit of prophecy to predict that the operations of the civil engineer department will, in a very few years, rival in expenditures, and numerical strength of agents and operatives, the military and naval service of the Government, and constitute a more alarming branch of public patronage than is to be found elsewhere in the Government. From the peculiar nature of their expenditures, corruption, favoritism, and peculation, may be reduced to system more successfully in them than in almost any other branch of the civil administration.

No two works are dependent upon the same calculations, because of the differences of their locations, and in the locality and nature of the material with which they are constructed, and because of numerous other considerations that enter into the account; and since all the results are necessarily dependent, in the main, upon mere estimates, these may be excessive, or prove inaccurate, from positive design, and without a betrayal of the motives influencing them, to an extent that can attach either censure or punishment, however they may be merited. And so flattering to popular expectation is every local improvement, carried on at the expense of the Federal Government, that the grossest abuses are more readily submitted to, in such expenditures, by whole communities interested, than is the smallest extravagance in matters that fall immediately upon themselves for support.

The representative himself seldom feels it to be his duty to encounter or thwart a strong inclination of the popular will of his district to be satisfied with appropriations that purport to be for its benefit, though persuaded that they are both useless and unavailing in fact, and expended also without due regard to economy.

In confirmation of the views here advanced of the expensive tendency of this branch of the National Government and federal patronage, the committee beg leave to refer the House to such data as are furnished in the appropriation bills of late years, for harbors and rivers alone.

In 1824 the appropriation amounted to	$100,000
1826 do do	85,320
1827 do do	82,176
1828 do do	312,313
1829 do do	129,493
1830 do do	367,114
1831 do do	445,474
1832 do do	745,586
1833 do do	495,600
1834 do do	629,956
1835 do do	502,257
1836 do do	1,786,884

And for 1837, the sum of two millions three hundred and twenty-one thousand five hundred and thirty-six dollars is asked by the Engineer department, to conduct those works only that have been commenced, and exclusive of appropriations for new works.

The committee are of opinion that such an appropriation is largely disproportioned to the other expenditures of the Government, and adverse to its economical administration. It should awaken Congress to serious reflection upon the policy of a system thus expensive. The committee have graduated the appropriations to the several works, according to the best information they can acquire relative to the several interests involved. It would seem to be very desirable that the department having charge of this branch of expenditure should adopt some method of classifying all the works now in progress, and all that may be instituted under its charge, according to their relative importance, somewhat in the manner that the military fortifications in the course of construction, or that have been projected, have been classified in former years; that those may be completed, at an early day, which are of primary necessity; and the remainder be conducted forward, thereafter, as the resources of the Government, public interest, and sound economy, may dictate. It is believed entirely competent for the department to do this, and to institute any other salutary rules of conducting these works that might be calculated to elucidate their worth, progress, or cost, respectively, and enable Congress to judge more understandingly of each than has yet been practicable. They involve various details that can be judged of accurately only by comparison with each other, in connexion with the geographical and commercial data from which they respectively derive importance; and too great vigilance cannot be called into requisition, by the department, in the collation of them for the use and information of Congress.

The committee report a bill of appropriations, for the year 1837, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of nine hundred and sixteen thousand six hundred and seventy-five dollars.

MR. STEVENSON'S APPOINTMENT.

IN SENATE, March 3, 1836.

Mr. Clay, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the nomination of Andrew Stevenson, of Virginia, as Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary to Great Britain, have, according to order, had the same under consideration, and now beg leave to report:

That, on the 30th of May, 1834, Andrew Stevenson was nominated for the same office, and on the 24th of the succeeding month he was rejected by the Senate; that Martin Van Buren, of New York, had been previously nominated for the same office, and, on the 25th of January, 1832, had been rejected by the Senate; that it remained vacant from this period until the nomination of Mr. Stevenson, and it has continued vacant from the time of his rejection. This office has, therefore, been unoccupied during a term of more than four years.

When Mr. Stevenson was first nominated, he was Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, which office he resigned on the — day of June, 1834. Whilst that nomination was under consideration, it appeared to the Senate that the Secretary of State had, on the 15th day of March, 1833, addressed an official note to Mr. Stevenson, in which the Secretary said: "I am directed by the President to inform you, confidentially, that, as soon as advices shall be received that the British Government consent to open negotiations with this, which are daily expected, it is his intention to offer you the place of minister plenipotentiary to the court of St. James; and he requests that, should this appointment be agreeable to you, you would hold yourself in readiness to embark in the course of the summer. I congratulate you, sir, on this mark of the President's confidence." This note was received by Mr. Stevenson; but, if he returned a direct answer, it did not appear to the Senate.

Subsequent to the receipt of this note, in April, 1833, Mr. Stevenson was elected a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Virginia, took his seat at the commencement of the session of Congress in the December following, was elected Speaker of the House, and continued to discharge the duties of that office until he resigned it, as hereinbefore stated.

It appeared further to the Senate that, shortly after Mr. Stevenson received the note of the Secretary of State before mentioned, he had an interview and consultation with Mr. Thomas Ritchie, his friend and neighbor, and the editor of a leading newspaper supporting the administration, published at Richmond, in Virginia, on the subject of the contents of that note. In that interview, Mr. Ritchie, in a letter addressed to Mr. Stevenson, in June, 1834, says, it struck him that the President might appoint Mr. Stevenson, in case the contingency happened during the recess, and not send him, but Mr. Livingston, to France. "I suggested (says he) that these appointments ought not, and could not be made, according to the spirit of the constitution, during the recess of the Senate. You (Mr. Stevenson) promptly and cordially concurred in this view of the subject, and I then determined to write to a friend in Washington, for the purpose of laying this view before the President himself. You approved of my doing so; and, in fact, we agreed perfectly in the course to be taken. We determined to take no notice of Mr. Livingston's letter, to act yourself as if no such letter had been written; that it would be best not to offer to accept the appointment if made in the summer, and to wait the action of the Senate," &c.

In pursuance of the plan thus arranged between Mr. Stevenson and Mr. Ritchie, the latter, in March, 1833, addressed two letters to Mr. W. B. Lewis, at the city of Washington, who was the friend and enjoyed the confidence of the President, and held the office of Auditor. Extracts from these letters were furnished by Mr. Lewis, and presented to the Senate on the occasion of the first nomination of Mr. Stevenson. Mr. Ritchie says to Mr. Lewis: "I am about to address you on a subject which has caused much speculation among our friends, and great uneasiness in my bosom. I speak to you as a friend, and without the slightest reserve. The papers have recently spoken of a batch of appointments which the President is about to make, embracing the two highest missions to European courts, and the two highest seats in his cabinet. I have conversed freely with our friend Stevenson upon them, and I have this day communicated to him my intention to write to you, and to lay before you my own views of the matter.

"We have the utmost confidence in the virtue of Gen. Jackson. We have no idea that he would arrogate to himself new powers, at the expense of the other departments of the Government. His generous ambition has been fully satisfied! He has nothing more to ask of his country than her verdict of approbation when he lays down the high and difficult office with which he is intrusted! We all know it, and every candid individual admits it! We believe that the course he may pursue will be with a single eye to the public interest. But whilst we dismiss all apprehensions that he will designedly abuse his authority, we wish, at the same time, that he should do no act which may be pleaded, hereafter, by an unworthy predecessor, in justification of his acts. In this last term of his administration, we wish to see no precedent set which may be perverted in future times; we desire it on our own account as well as that of our country. We wish to see his administration set in glory; and we wish to see our country benefited, in all time to come, by his pure example. But this cannot be, if any error should be committed against principle, even from the best of motives; if any authority should be assumed which does not fairly belong to him, or even if any doubtful power should be exercised upon any delicate branch of the constitution, his high popularity would only make it more current. One of the highest powers which attaches to the Executive is that of appointment; over its exercise is accordingly thrown, and wisely thrown, the check of concurrence by the Senate. Now, sir, doubts do exist whether the vacancy in the missions to London and Paris did not originally occur during the recess of the Senate. Secondly, whether the vacancy does not still exist; and, thirdly, whether it ought now to be filled without a consultation with the Senate."

The letters from which these extracts were taken, having been written expressly with a view of being laid before the President, there can be no doubt that it was done. Their main object, that of preventing the appointment of Mr. Stevenson in the vacation of the Senate, was secured. The President forbore to make it, and waited until the Senate assembled at the ensuing session before the nomination was made.

It is stated by the President, in his message of the 13th June, 1834, communicating the note of the Secretary of State to Mr. Stevenson, that the negotiations to which it refers were commenced early in April, 1833, in the city of Washington, instead of London, and as they have been since conducted here, no further communication was made to Mr. Stevenson. What these negotiations were has not been stated. Whatever they might have been, the residence of a minister of the United States at London, at all times, is obviously proper; and that the appointment of Mr. Stevenson did not depend upon any particular negotiations, is manifest from the fact of his having been finally nominated to the office. If the President had abandoned all intention of sending him to England, inasmuch as he had been requested to hold himself in readiness to go, during the summer of 1833, and had not declined the offer, he would probably have been notified of the change in the views of the President.

The Senate saw, therefore, that a promise of the mission to Great Britain had been communicated to Mr. Stevenson on the 15th March, 1833. They saw an indirect intervention, with Mr. Stevenson's knowledge and acquiescence, to prevail on the President not to make the appointment in the vacation of the Senate, in accommodation to the views of Mr. Stevenson and his friend Mr. Ritchie.

They saw that the President did forbear to make the appointment in the vacation of the Senate. And they saw the final execution of the promise, as far as it depended upon the Executive, by his nomination on the 30th May, 1834. During this long interval, he had been elected by the people of a congressional district in Virginia as their representative, ignorant of his having possession of such an official promise; he had been elected, under like ignorance, by the House of Representatives, as their Speaker; and, in that station, had performed all the highly important duties incident to it. That office, at all times one of great influence, possessed more than ordinary weight in the session of 1833-'4. The President, some time before its commencement, had directed the public deposits to be withdrawn from the Bank of the United States, and placed in the local banks. That measure excited deep and general sensation throughout the country; divided the people; divided the constitutional advisers of the President; divided Congress, and became a subject of warm and animated discussion in both Houses. It was at this extraordinary period that the Speaker of the House of Representatives, invested with the power of appointing and arranging the committees of the House, and wielding a great influence, secretly held a written official promise of the most important mission abroad, every body being ignorant of the fact except himself, the President, the Secretary of State, and a few confidential friends.

It was under these circumstances that his nomination came up for consideration in the Senate. It is a fundamental principle of free Governments, that, in order to preserve the purity of their administration, each of the three departments into which, according to all safe maxims, they are divided, should be kept independent of and without the influence of the others. But if the head of one of those departments may, at a critical period, confidentially present, and for a long period of time hold up to the presiding officer of the popular branch of another, the powerful inducement of a splendid foreign mission, is there not imminent danger of undue subserviency? of a failure of that presiding officer faithfully and independently to discharge the high duties of his exalted station?

The Senate thought there was, and withheld its advice and consent to the nomination of Mr. Stevenson as minister to Great Britain. And now, after a lapse of near two years, with all the circumstances by which his original nomination was attended remaining in full force, but with considerable individual variations in the composition of the Senate, the same individual is again nominated by the President for the same office. Doubtless a place, more than any other foreign appointment, important to be constantly occupied, has not been kept vacant with a view to, or in expectation of, any such variations. Doubtless, in the ample field for selection which the intelligence and patriotism of near fifteen millions of people offer, some individual, equally well qualified with and less exceptionable than Mr. Stevenson, might be designated to represent the United States at the court of St. James. Doubtless no personal feelings or wishes to achieve a triumph over the Senate can have prompted the renewal of this nomination.

Whatever may have been its motives, the committee neither know nor have any thing to do with them. They are not themselves aware of any peculiar fitness in Mr. Stevenson, or any absolute necessity of deputing him, and only him, as the minister of the United States to Great Britain. In ordinary times, the fact of his being unacceptable to a large portion of the Senate, even if that did not constitute an actual majority, would be regarded as deserving of consideration. In a free Government, it should be the aim of those who administer it to promote harmony in the public councils, and satisfaction among the people.

The Senate of the United States is supposed, by the theory of the constitution, to be as free and independent in the exercise of its judgment on nominations submitted to its consideration, as the President is in proposing them. Each of the two components of the appointing power acts upon its own sense of duty, and upon its own responsibility. The Senate has no right to require the President to nominate any particular individual, and the President has no right to require the Senate to confirm any particular nomination. When the Senate has once decided upon a nomination, there ought to be an end of the matter.

Prior to the present administration, instances of renomination were rare, and are believed to have occurred only when some indication was given from the Senate of a desire that it should take place. It has of late become much more frequent. The practice is liable to great abuses. A President disposed to advance favorites to public offices, and finding a Senate disagreeing with him as to their fitness, may forbear for a long time, to the detriment of the public service, to nominate any person to fill them, until, from those changes of individual members to which all collective bodies are liable, a Senate happens to be formed more yielding and complying. When a nomination is once rejected, the exact state of the votes of the Senate is known to the President; and if the practice of renomination is indulged, in process of time there will be danger of the existence or the imputation of corruption. The committee think that the practice ought to be resisted; that, when the Senate has once rejected an individual nomination, the decision ought to be held as final and conclusive; and that it ought not to confirm the nomination of the same person, when again made for the same office, without strong special cause. In the present case, no such cause is alleged or known to exist; whilst all the considerations which formerly opposed the confirmation of Mr. Stevenson continue in unabated strength. The committee, therefore, recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate do not advise and consent to the appointment of Andrew Stevenson as minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary to Great Britain.

LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES,

PASSED AT THE SECOND SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, WHICH WAS BEGUN AND HELD AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ON MONDAY, THE FIFTH DAY OF DECEMBER, ONE THOUSAND EIGHT HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SIX.

AN ACT to regulate, in certain cases, the disposition of the proceeds of lands ceded by Indian tribes to the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all moneys received from the sales of lands that have been, or may be hereafter, ceded to the United States by Indian tribes, by treaties providing for the investment or payment to the Indians, parties thereto, of the proceeds of the lands ceded by them respectively, after deducting the expenses of survey and sale, any sums stipulated to be advanced, and the expenses of fulfilling any engagements contained therein, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, in the same manner that money received from the sales of public lands are paid into the Treasury.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all sums that are or may be required to be paid, and all moneys that are or may be required to be invested by said treaties, are hereby appropriated in conformity to them, and shall be drawn from the Treasury as other public moneys are drawn therefrom, under such instructions as may, from time to time, be given by the President.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all investments of stock that are or may be required by said treaties shall be made under the direction of the President; and special accounts of the funds under the said treaties shall be kept at the Treasury, and statements thereof be annually laid before Congress.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the 4th section of the act of June 14th, 1836, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Indian department," &c., be, and are hereby, extended in such manner as to apply to the disposition of all moneys that may hereafter be received under the treaties therein named, or under any others containing similar stipulations for the payment to the Indians, annually, of interest upon the proceeds of the lands ceded by them.

Approved January 9, 1837.

AN ACT making an appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities.

Be it enacted, &c., That the further sum of two millions of dollars shall be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray any expenses which have been or may be incurred in preventing or suppressing the hostilities of any Indians; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, conformably to the acts of Congress of the nineteenth of March and the second of July last, and of the acts therein referred to.

Approved January 9, 1837.

AN ACT supplementary to the act entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the officers of the mint of the United States shall be a director, a treasurer, an assayer, a melter and refiner, a chief coiner and an engraver, to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the respective duties of the officers of the mint shall be as follows:

First. The director shall have the control and management of the mint, the superintendence of the officers and persons employed therein, and the general regulation and supervision of the business of the several branches. And in the month of January of every year, he shall make report to the President of the United States of the operations of the mint and its branches for the year preceding; and, also, to the Secretary of the Treasury, from time to time, as said Secretary shall require, setting forth all the operations of the mint subsequent to the last report made upon the subject.

Second. The treasurer shall receive, and safely keep, all moneys which shall be for the use and support of the mint; shall keep all the current accounts of the mint, and pay all moneys due by the mint, on warrants from the director. He shall receive all bullion brought to the mint for coinage; shall be the keeper of all bullion and coin in the mint, except while the same is legally placed in the hands of other officers, and shall, on warrants from the director, deliver all coins struck at the mint, to the persons to whom they shall be legally payable. And he shall keep regular and faithful accounts of all the transactions of the mint, in bullion and coins, both with the officers of the mint and the depositors; and shall present, quarter-yearly, to the Treasury Department of the United States, according to such forms as shall be prescribed by that Department, an account of the receipts and disbursements of the mint, for the purpose of being adjusted and settled.

Third. The assayer shall carefully assay all metals used in coinage, whenever such assays are required in the operations of the mint; and he shall also make assays of coins whenever instructed to do so by the director.

Fourth. The melter and refiner shall execute all the operations which are necessary in order to form ingots of standard silver or gold, suitable for the chief coiner, from the metals legally delivered to him for that purpose.

Fifth. The chief coiner shall execute all the operations which are necessary in order to form coins, conformable in all respects to the law, from the standard silver and gold ingots, and the copper planchets, legally delivered to him for this purpose.

Sixth. The engraver shall prepare and engrave, with the legal devices and inscriptions, all the dies used in the coinage of the mint and its branches.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the director shall appoint, with the approbation of the President, assistants to the assayer, melter and refiner, chief coiner, and engraver, and clerks for the director and treasurer, whenever, on representation made by the director to the President, it shall be the opinion of the President that such assistants or clerks are necessary; and it shall be the duty of the assistants to aid their principals in the execution of their respective offices, and of the clerks to perform such duties as shall be prescribed for them by the director.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That whenever any officer of the mint shall be temporarily absent on account of sickness, or any other sufficient cause, it shall be lawful for the director, with the assent of said officer, to appoint some person attached to the mint to act in the place of such officer during his absence, and that the director shall employ such workmen and servants in the mint as he shall from time to time find necessary.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That every officer, assistant, and clerk of the mint, shall, before he enters upon the execution of his office, take an oath or affirmation before some judge of the United States, or judge of the superior court or any court of record of any State, faithfully and diligently to perform the duties thereof.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the following officers of the mint, before entering upon the execution of their respective offices, shall become bound to the United States, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the sums hereinafter mentioned, with condition for the faithful and diligent performance of the duties of their offices, viz: the treasurer in the sum of ten thousand dollars; the assayer in the sum of five thousand dollars; the melter and refiner in the sum of ten thousand dollars; and the chief coiner in the sum of ten thousand dollars. And that similar bonds may also be required of the assistants and clerks, in such sums as the director shall determine, with the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed to the officers of the mint the following salaries per annum: To the director, for his services, including traveling expenses incurred in visiting the different branches, and all other charges whatever, three thousand five hundred dollars; to the treasurer, assayer, melter and refiner, chief coiner, and engraver, each, two thousand dollars; to the assistants and clerks, such annual salaries shall be allowed as the director may determine, with the approbation of the President: Provided, That an assistant shall not receive more than fifteen hundred dollars; and that a clerk shall not receive more than twelve hundred dollars; to the workmen and servants shall be allowed such wages, to be determined by the director, as may be customary and reasonable, according to their respective stations and occupations; and that the salaries provided for in this section shall be payable in quarterly instalments.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the standard for both gold and silver coins of the United States shall hereafter be such, that of one thousand parts by weight, nine hundred shall be of pure metal, and one hundred of alloy; and the alloy of the silver coins shall be of copper; and the alloy of the gold coins shall be of copper and silver, provided that the silver do not exceed one-half of the whole alloy.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That, of the silver coins, the dollar shall be of the weight of four hundred and twelve and one-half grains; the half dollar of the weight of two hundred and six and one-fourth grains; the quarter dollar of the weight of one hundred and three and one-eighth grains; the dime, or tenth part of a dollar, of the weight of forty-one and a quarter grains; and the half dime, or twentieth part of a dollar, of the weight of twenty grains and five-eighths of a grain. And the dollars, half dollars, and quarter dollars, dimes and half dimes, shall be legal tenders of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sums whatever.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That, of the gold coins, the weight of the eagle shall be two hundred and fifty-eight grains; that of the half eagle one hundred and twenty-nine grains; and that of the quarter eagle sixty-four and one-half grains. And that, for all sums whatever, the eagle shall be a legal tender of payment for ten dollars; the half eagle for five dollars; and the quarter eagle for two and a half dollars.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the silver coins heretofore issued at the mint of the United States, and the gold coins issued since the thirty-first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-four, shall continue to be legal tenders of payment for their nominal values on the same terms as if they were of the coinage provided for by this act.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That, of the copper coins, the weight of the cent shall be one hundred and sixty-eight grains, and the weight of the half cent eighty-four grains. And the cent shall be considered of the value of one-hundredth part of a dollar, and the half cent of the value of one two-hundredth part of a dollar.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That upon the coins struck at the mint there shall be the following devices and legends: upon one side of each of said coins there shall be an impression emblematic of liberty, with an inscription of the word LIBERTY, and the year of the coinage; and upon the reverse of each of the gold and silver coins, there shall be the figure or representation of an eagle, with the inscription UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, and a designation of the value of the coin; but on the reverse of the dime and half dime, cent and half cent, the figure of the eagle shall be omitted.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That gold and silver bullion brought to the mint for coinage, shall be received and coined, by the proper officers, for the benefit of the depositor: Provided, That it shall be lawful to refuse at the mint any deposit of less value than one hundred dollars, and any bullion so base as to be unsuitable for the operations of the mint: And provided, also, That when gold and silver are combined, if either of these metals be in such small proportion that it cannot be separated advantageously, no allowance shall be made to the depositor for the value of such metal.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That when bullion is brought to the mint for coinage, it shall be weighed by the treasurer, in the presence of the depositor, when practicable, and a receipt given, which shall state the description and weight of the bullion: Provided, That when the bullion is in such a state as to require melting before its value can be ascertained, the weight after melting shall be considered as the true weight of the bullion deposited.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That from every parcel of bullion deposited for coinage, the treasurer shall deliver to the assayer a sufficient portion for the purpose of being assayed; but all such bullion remaining from the operations of the assay shall be returned to the treasurer by the assayer.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That the assayer shall report to the treasurer the quality or standard of the bullion assayed by him; and he shall also communicate to the treasurer such information as will enable him to estimate the amount of the charges hereinafter provided for, to be made to the depositor, for the expenses of converting the bullion into standard metal fit for coinage.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That the only subjects of charge by the mint to the depositor shall be the following: For refining when the bullion is below standard; for toughening when metals are contained in it which render it unfit for coinage; for copper used for alloy when the bullion is above standard; for silver introduced into the alloy of gold; and for separating the gold and silver when these metals exist together in the bullion: and that the rate of these charges shall be fixed, from time to time, by the director, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury, so as not to exceed, in their judgment, the actual expense to the mint of the materials and labor employed in each of the cases aforementioned; and that the amount received from these charges shall be accounted for, and appropriated for defraying the contingent expenses of the mint.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That from the report of the assayer, and the weight of the bullion, the treasurer shall estimate the whole value of each deposit, and also the amount of the charges or deductions, if any; of all which he shall give a detailed memorandum to the depositor; and he shall also give, at the same time, under his hand, a certificate of the nett amount of the deposit, to be paid in coins of the same species of bullion as that deposited.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That parcels of bullion shall be, from time to time, transferred by the treasurer to the melter and refiner; that a careful record of these transfers, noting the weight and character of the bullion, shall be kept; and that the bullion thus placed in the hands of the melter and refiner shall be subjected to the several processes which may be necessary to form it into ingots of the legal standard, and of a quality suitable for coinage.

Sec. 21. And be it further enacted, That the ingots thus prepared shall be assayed by the assayer, and if they prove to be within the limits allowed for deviation from the standard, they shall be transferred by the melter and refiner to the treasurer, accompanied by the assayer's certificate of their fineness; and that a careful record of the transfer shall be kept by the treasurer.

Sec. 22. And be it further enacted, That no ingots of gold shall be used for coinage of which the quality differs more than two thousandths from the legal standard; and that no ingots of silver shall be used for coinage of which the quality differs more than three thousandths from the legal standard.

Sec. 23. And be it further enacted, That in the treasurer's account with the melter and refiner, the melter and refiner shall be debited with the standard weight of all the bullion placed in his hands, that is to say, with the weight of metal of legal standard fineness which it will make; and that he shall be credited by the standard weight of all the ingots delivered by him to the treasurer; and that once at least in every year, at such time as the director shall appoint, the melter and refiner shall deliver up to the treasurer all the bullion in his possession, in order that his accounts may be settled up to that time; and, in this settlement, he shall be entitled to a credit for the difference between the whole amount of bullion delivered to him and received from him, since the last settlement, as an allowance for necessary waste: Provided, That this allowance shall not exceed two thousandths of the whole amount of gold and silver bullion, respectively, that had been delivered to him by the treasurer.

Sec. 24. And be it further enacted, That the treasurer shall, from time to time, deliver over to the chief coiner ingots for the purpose of coinage; that he shall keep a faithful record of these transfers, noting the weight and description of the ingots; and that the ingots thus placed in the hands of the chief coiner shall be passed through the several processes necessary to make from them coins, in all respects, conformable to law.

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That, in adjusting the weights of the coins, the following deviations from the standard weight shall not be exceeded in any of the single pieces: in the dollar and half dollar, one grain and a half; in the quarter dollar, one grain; in the dime and half dime, half a grain; in the gold coins, one-quarter of a grain; in the copper coins, one grain in the pennyweight; and that, in weighing a large number of pieces together, when delivered from the chief coiner to the treasurer, and from the treasurer to the depositors, the deviations from the standard weight shall not exceed the following limits: four pennyweights in one thousand dollars; three pennyweights in one thousand half dollars; two pennyweights in one thousand quarter dollars; one pennyweight in one thousand dimes; one pennyweight in thousand half dimes; two pennyweights in one thousand eagles; one and a half pennyweight in one thousand half eagles; one pennyweight in one thousand quarter eagles.

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That the chief coiner shall, from time to time, as the coins are prepared, deliver them over to the treasurer, who shall keep a careful record of their kind, number, and weight; that, in receiving the coins, it shall be the duty of the treasurer to see whether the coins of that delivery are within the legal limits of the standard weight; and, if his trials for this purpose shall not prove satisfactory, he shall cause all the coins of this delivery to be weighed separately, and such as are not of legal weight shall be delivered to the melter and refiner, as standard bullion, to be again formed into ingots and recoined.

Sec. 27. And be it further enacted, That, at every delivery of coins made by the chief coiner to the treasurer, it shall be the duty of the treasurer, in the presence of the assayer, to take indiscriminately a certain number of pieces of each variety for the annual trial of coins, (the number being prescribed by the director,) which shall be carefully labelled, and deposited in a chest appropriated for the purpose, kept under the joint care of the treasurer and assayer, and so secured that neither can have access to its contents without the presence of the other.

Sec. 28. And be it further enacted, That the chief coiner shall, from time to time, deliver to the treasurer the clippings and other portions of bullion remaining after the process of coining, and that the treasurer shall keep a careful record of their amount.

Sec. 29. And be it further enacted, That in the treasurer's account with the chief coiner, the chief coiner shall be debited with the amount in weight of standard metal of all the bullion placed in his hands, and credited with the amount, also by weight, of all the coins, clippings, and other bullion delivered by him to the treasurer; and that once at least in every year, at such time as the director shall appoint, the chief coiner shall deliver to the treasurer all the coins and bullion in his possession, so that his accounts may be settled up to that time; and in this settlement he shall be entitled to a credit for the difference between the whole amount of the ingots delivered to him, and of the coins and bullion received from him, since the last settlement, as an allowance for necessary waste: Provided, That this allowance shall not exceed two thousandths of the whole amount of the silver, or one and one-half thousandth of the whole amount of the gold, that had been delivered to him by the treasurer.

Sec. 30. And be it further enacted, That when the coins which are the equivalent to any deposit of bullion are ready for delivery, they shall be paid over to the depositor, or his order, by the treasurer, on a warrant from the director; and the payment shall be made, if demanded, in the order in which the bullion shall have been brought to the mint, giving priority according to priority of deposit only, and that, in the denominations of coin delivered, the treasurer shall comply with the wishes of the depositor, unless when impracticable or inconvenient to do so; in which case the denominations of coin shall be designated by the director.

Sec. 31. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of enabling the mint to make returns to depositors with as little delay as possible, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to keep in the said mint, when the state of the Treasury will admit thereof, a deposit of such amount of public money, or of bullion procured for the purpose, as he shall judge convenient and necessary, not exceeding one million of dollars, out of which those who bring bullion to the mint may be paid the value thereof as soon as practicable after this value has been ascertained; that the bullion so deposited shall become the property of the United States; that no discount or interest shall be charged on moneys so advanced; and that the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time withdraw the said deposit, or any part thereof, or may, at his discretion, allow the coins formed at the mint to be given for their equivalent in other money.

Sec. 32. And be it further enacted, That, to secure a due conformity in the gold and silver coins to their respective standards and weights, an annual trial shall be made of the pieces reserved for this purpose at the mint and its branches, before the judge of the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, the attorney of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, and the collector of the port of Philadelphia, and such other persons as the President shall, from time to time, designate for that purpose, who shall meet as commissioners for the performance of this duty on the second Monday in February, annually, and may continue their meetings, by adjournment, if necessary; and if a majority of the commissioners shall fail to attend at any time appointed for their meeting, then the director of the mint shall call a meeting of the commissioners at such other time as he may deem convenient; and that before these commissioners, or a majority of them, and in the presence of the officers of the mint, such examination shall be made of the reserved pieces as shall be judged sufficient; and if it shall appear that these pieces do not differ from the standard fineness and weight by a greater quantity than is allowed by law, the trial shall be considered and reported as satisfactory; but if any greater deviation from the legal standard or weight shall appear, this fact shall be certified to the President of the United States; and if, on a view of the circumstances of the case, he shall so decide, the officer or officers implicated in the error shall be thenceforward disqualified from holding their respective offices.

Sec. 33. And be it further enacted, That copper bullion shall be purchased for the mint, from time to time, by the treasurer, under instructions from the director; that the cost shall be paid from the fund hereinafter provided for; and that the copper bullion shall be of good quality, and in the form of planchets, fit for passing at once into the hands of the chief coiner.

Sec. 34. And be it further enacted, That the copper planchets shall be delivered, from time to time, by the treasurer to the chief coiner, to be by him coined; and all such copper shall be returned to the treasurer, by the chief coiner, weight for weight, without allowance for waste.

Sec. 35. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the treasurer of the mint to deliver the copper coins in exchange for their legal equivalent in other money, to any persons who shall apply for them: Provided, That the sum asked for be not less than a certain amount, to be determined by the director, and that it be not so great as, in his judgment, to interfere with the capacity of the mint to supply other applicants.

Sec. 36. And be it further enacted, That the copper coins may, at the discretion of the director, be delivered in any of the principal cities and towns of the United States, at the cost of the mint for transportation.

Sec. 37. And be it further enacted, That the money received by the treasurer in exchange for copper coins shall form a fund in his hands, which shall be used to purchase copper planchets, and to pay the expense of transportation of copper coins; and that, if there be a surplus, the same shall be appropriated to defray the contingent expenses of the mint.

Sec. 38. And be it further enacted, That all acts or parts of acts heretofore passed, relating to the mint and coins of the United States, which are inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Approved January 18, 1837.

AN ACT making appropriations for the payment of the revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven.

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the pensioners of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven:

For the revolutionary pensioners, under the several acts, other than those of the fifteenth of May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, the seventh of June, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, and the fourth of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, seven hundred and twelve thousand five hundred and sixty dollars.

For the invalid pensioners, under various laws, three hundred and twenty-five thousand three hundred and seventy-six dollars.

For pensions to widows and orphans, under the act of the fourth of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, five hundred and fifty-two thousand dollars.

For pensions to widows and orphans, payable through the office of the Third Auditor, four thousand dollars.

Approved January 18, 1837.

AN ACT to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That any field, or staff, or other officer, mounted militiaman, volunteer, ranger, or cavalry, engaged in the military service of the United States since the eighteenth of June, eighteen hundred and twelve, or who shall hereafter be in said service, and has sustained, or shall sustain damage, without any fault or negligence on his part, while in said service, by the loss of a horse in battle, or by the loss of a horse wounded in battle, and which has died or shall die of said wound, or being so wounded shall be abandoned by order of his officer, and lost, or shall sustain damage by the loss of any horse by death or abandonment, in consequence of the United States failing to supply sufficient forage, or because the rider was dismounted and separated from his horse, and ordered to do duty on foot at a station detached from his horse, or when the officer in the immediate command ordered or shall order the horse turned out to graze in the woods, prairies, or commons, because the United States failed or shall fail to supply sufficient forage, and the loss was or shall be consequent thereof; or for the loss of necessary equipage, in consequence of the loss of his horse as aforesaid, shall be allowed and paid the value thereof: Provided, That if any payment has been, or shall be, made to any one aforesaid, for the use and risk, or for forage after the death, loss, or abandonment of his horse, said payment shall be deducted from the value thereof, unless he satisfied or shall satisfy the paymaster, at the time he made or shall make the payment, or thereafter show, by proof, that he was remounted, in which case the deduction shall only extend to the time he was on foot: And provided, also, If any payment shall have been, or shall hereafter be, made to any person abovementioned on account of clothing, to which he was not entitled by law, such payment shall be deducted from the value of his horse or accoutrements.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person who, in the said military service as a volunteer, or draughted militiaman, furnished or shall furnish himself with arms and military accoutrements, and sustained or shall sustain damage by the capture or destruction of the same, without any fault or negligence on his part, or who lost or shall lose the same by reason of his being wounded in the service, shall be allowed and paid the value thereof.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That any person who sustained or shall sustain damage by the loss, capture, or destruction, by an enemy, of any horse, mule, or wagon, cart, boat, sleigh, or harness, while such property was in the military service of the United States, either by impressment or contract, except in cases where the risk to which the property would be exposed was agreed to be incurred by the owner, if it shall appear that such loss, capture, or destruction was without any fault or negligence on the part of the owner; and any person who, without any such fault or negligence, sustained or shall sustain damage by the death or abandonment and loss of any such horse, mule, or ox, while in the service aforesaid, in consequence of the failure on the part of the United States to furnish the same with sufficient forage, shall be allowed and paid the value thereof.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the claims provided for under this act shall be adjusted by the Third Auditor, under such rules as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War, under the direction or with the assent of the President of the United States, as well in regard to the receipt of applications of claimants, as the species and degrees of evidence, the manner in which such evidence shall be taken and authenticated, which rules shall be such as, in the opinion of the President, shall be best calculated to obtain the object of this act, paying a due regard as well to the claims of individual justice as to the interests of the United States, which rules and regulations shall be published for four weeks in such newspapers in which the laws of the United States are published as the Secretary of War shall direct.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, in all adjudications of said Auditor upon the claims above mentioned, whether such judgment be in favor of, or adverse to, the claim, shall be entered in a book provided by him for that purpose, and under his direction; and when such judgment shall be in favor of such claim, the claimant, or his legal representative, shall be entitled to the amount thereof upon the production of a copy thereof, certified by the said Auditor, at the Treasury of the United States.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That, in all instances where any minor has been, or shall be, engaged in the military service of the United States, and was, or shall be, provided with a horse or equipments, or with military accoutrements, by his parent or guardian, and has died, or shall die, without paying for said property, and the same has been or shall be lost, captured, destroyed, or abandoned in the manner before mentioned, said parent or guardian shall be allowed pay therefor, on making satisfactory proof, as in other cases, and the further proof that he is entitled thereto by having furnished the same.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That, in all instances where any person, other than a minor, has been or shall be engaged in the military service aforesaid, and has been or shall be provided with a horse or equipments, or with military accoutrements, by any person, the owner thereof, who has risked or shall take the risk of such horse, equipments, or military accoutrements, on himself, and the same has been or shall be lost, captured, destroyed, or abandoned in the manner before mentioned, such owner shall be allowed pay therefor, on making satisfactory proof, as in other cases, and the further proof that he is entitled thereto by having furnished the same, and having taken the risk on himself.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the act passed on the nineteenth of February, eighteen hundred and thirty-three, entitled "An act for the payment of horses and arms lost in the military service of the United States against the Indians on the frontier of Illinois and Michigan Territory," and an act passed on the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, entitled "An act to provide for the payment of claims for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, during the late war with the Indians on the frontier of Illinois and Michigan Territory," be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be and remain in force until the close of the next session of Congress.

Approved January 18, 1837.

AN ACT to admit the State of Michigan into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States.

Whereas, in pursuance of the act of Congress of June the fifteenth, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, entitled "An act to establish the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, upon the conditions therein expressed," a convention of delegates, elected by the people of the said State of Michigan, for the sole purpose of giving their assent to the boundaries of the said State of Michigan, as described, declared, and established in and by the said act, did, on the fifteenth of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, assent to the provisions of the said act, therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the State of Michigan shall be one, and is hereby declared to be one, of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury, in carrying into effect the thirteenth and fourteenth sections of the act of the twenty-third of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," shall consider the State of Michigan as being one of the United States.

Approved January 26, 1837.

AN ACT for the relief of Robert P. Letcher and Thomas P. Moore.

Be it enacted, &c., That there paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Robert P. Letcher, the sum of one thousand five hundred and forty-four dollars, and to Thomas P. Moore, the like sum of one thousand five hundred and forty-four dollars; the same being at the rate of eight dollars per day from the second day of December, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, to the twelfth of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, both inclusive, being the period occupied by the House of Representatives of the United States of the twenty-third Congress, in deciding the contest for a seat in the said House, as the Representative for the fifth congressional district of the State of Kentucky, which seat was claimed by each of said parties; and that the allowance for traveling, as fixed by law for a member of Congress, be, and the same is hereby, granted and allowed to the said Robert P. Letcher and to the said Thomas P. Moore, for coming to and returning from the seat of Government to their residences, respectively, upon the most usual and accustomed route of travel; the amount of which allowance shall be ascertained by the accounting officers, and paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Approved January 31, 1837.

AN ACT for the relief of Norman Holt.

Be it enacted, &c., That Norman Holt, of Owen county, in the State of Indiana, shall be entitled to enter one quarter-quarter section of land, on any of the unsold lands in the Vincennes land district in said State, subject to entry at private sale, on his first surrendering to the United States, at the said office, the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section number twenty-five, in township twelve north, and range five west; and that the money paid by said Holt for the entry of said tract, shall be applied to the payment of such other tract or quarter-quarter section as the said Holt may enter in said district.

Approved January 31, 1837.

AN ACT to authorize certain railroad companies to construct railroads through the public lands in the Territory of Florida.

Be it enacted, &c., That the East Florida Railroad Company, a corporation established by an act of the Governor and Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, approved the fourth of February, anno Domini eighteen hundred and thirty-five, be, and they hereby are, authorized to locate and construct a railroad on the following route, to wit: commencing on the St. John's river, and thence, in the most convenient and suitable direction, to Tallahassee, or the waters of St. Mark's river or bay, on the Gulf of Mexico, or to any other point east of or between the St. Mark's and Apalachicola rivers, which may be selected by said company.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said company is further authorized, wherever the said route shall pass over the public lands of the United States, to locate the same thereon, eighty feet wide; which said location, if made according to the true intent and meaning of this act, shall be enjoyed by said company so long as they maintain the said road for the public accommodation.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said company shall have the right to take from the said public lands, timber, stone, and earth, whenever it may be convenient for the construction of any part of said way running through the same; also, to deposit and leave such materials upon such lands, whenever it may be necessary; also, to cut drains, where necessary, through the same; and during the period of the construction of said way, to occupy said lands along said route, doing as little injury thereto as may be.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, to entitle the said company to the enjoyment of the privileges herein provided for, they shall comply with the following conditions, to wit:

First, They shall cause the said route, whenever it passes over the public lands, to be surveyed, and the location of the way to be accurately delineated in their proper connexion, and a map thereof, and a copy of the locations, to be returned and deposited in the General Land Office, within six months from the date of the final location of said road.

Second, They shall cause permanent monuments to be erected along said route, conforming to such locations and maps, defining the limits of the way.

Third, Wherever the said railway shall intersect a highway or travelled way on the public lands, that way or ways shall be left unobstructed.

Fourth, Wherever it shall cross a stream or low grounds, such provision shall be made for draining off the water as to leave the said public lands uninjured by said railway.

Fifth, They shall complete the said way within the time provided for in the act of incorporation.

Sixth, Said location of said way shall be considered and treated as open way, and be kept up as such, and the lands abutting thereon shall be considered as abutting upon a public way.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the sections and quarter sections of public lands over which the said road may pass, shall be reserved by the United States for two years after the final location of the said way; and to this end the said company shall, as soon as they have resolved to survey or examine any route, give notice to the register of the land district in which the lands may be over which they intend to pass; and when the final location is made, a further notice of that fact shall be given, in like manner, of the lands over which it actually passes, which said last-mentioned lands shall be reserved as aforesaid from sale: Provided, That neither the said company nor any other person shall be authorized to settle on the said reserved sections or quarter sections; and no person so settling shall acquire thereby a pre-emptive right or claim to the said reserved lands, or to any part thereof; and if said company shall fail to give prompt and seasonable notice in both the above cases, they shall forfeit their privileges under this act.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the time for making the surveys and commencing the work, as prescribed in the said act of incorporation, be, and the same is hereby, extended for one year after the passage of this act.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Governor and Legislative Council of the said

Territory, or for the Legislature of the State of Florida hereafter, to provide by law for the construction of railroads from the Apalachicola river, or from any other point, to cross or intersect the abovementioned railroad, from the Georgia State line to the Gulf of Mexico.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the said East Florida Railroad Company be, and they are hereby, authorized to cross the railroad proposed to be made at any point between Tallahassee and St. Mark's.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the Territory or State of Florida shall, at the end of twenty years, have the privilege of taking one-fourth of the stock at par, by paying to the company the interest on the investment.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That all acts or parts of acts of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, inconsistent with the foregoing provisions, be, and the same are hereby, annulled.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the Pensacola and Perdido Railroad Company, organized under acts of the Governor and Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, and of the State of Alabama, be, and they are hereby, authorized to make a railroad from Pensacola to the waters of Mobile bay or river; and also, that the Brunswick and Florida Railroad Company, incorporated by an act of the Legislature of Georgia, be, and they are hereby authorized to extend their railroad from the Georgia line to the city of Tallahassee, and thence to the river Apalachicola, or St. George's sound, upon the same conditions and limitations contained in the foregoing provisions of this act.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the Lake Winnico and St. Joseph's Canal and Railroad Company, organized under acts of the Governor and Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, be, and they are hereby, authorized to locate and construct a railroad from the city of St. Joseph's to the city of Tallahassee, in said Territory, upon the same conditions and limitations contained in the foregoing provisions of this act; and in the construction of said road, may cross, or intersect, and form a junction with, any other railroad which may be made west of the city of Tallahassee.

Approved January 31, 1837.

AN ACT for the relief of Andrew Knox.

Be it enacted, &c., That Andrew Knox, of Washington county, in the State of Mississippi, be, and he is hereby, authorized and permitted to purchase, upon the payment of the minimum price to the receiver of the proper land district, section sixteen, in township fourteen, range nine west, in the Choctaw district, in said State, the purchase of which section heretofore was prevented by the illegal numbering of the sections in said township.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be selected and reserved for the use of schools within the said township numbered fourteen, in lieu of the aforesaid section, a section of land in equal extent in said Choctaw land district.

Approved February 3, 1837.

AN ACT for the relief of John E. Wool.

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the thirteenth section of the act of June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, entitled "An act to provide for the organization of the department of Indian affairs," as prescribes "that all merchandise required by any Indian treaty for the Indians payable after making such treaty, shall be purchased under the direction of the Secretary of War, upon proposals to be received to be based on notices previously to be given," be dispensed with so far as it may affect the purchases made by Brigadier General J. E. Wool under the eighteenth article of the treaty with the Cherokee Indians of December twenty-ninth, eighteen hundred and thirty-five, prior to the second day of November, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, and that the sums expended by him previous to that date be passed to his credit in the settlement of his accounts, and the drafts drawn by him on the Department of War on account thereof, be paid without reference to the said provisions of the said act.

Approved February 9, 1837.

AN ACT to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passage of this act, the port of New Orleans shall extend, on the river, from the lower to the upper corporate limits of the municipalities of the city of New Orleans.

Approved February 9, 1837.

AN ACT to change the name of the collection district of Dighton, in the State of Massachusetts, to Fall River, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the first day of April next, the said district, now known and called by the name of the Dighton district, shall be called the district of Fall River, and as such shall be made a port of entry for vessels arriving from the Cape of Good Hope, and from places beyond the same, any law now in force to the contrary notwithstanding.

Approved February 13, 1837.

AN ACT to amend an act entitled "An act to establish branches of the mint of the United States," passed the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five.

Be it enacted, &c., That the officers of the branch mint at New Orleans shall be one superintendent, one treasurer, one assayer, one melter and refiner, and one coiner; and that the officers of the branch mints at Charlotte and Dahlonega, severally, shall be one superintendent, who shall also perform the duties of treasurer; one assayer, who shall also perform the duties of melter and refiner; and one coiner; and the annual salaries of said officers shall be as follows: for the branch at New Orleans, to the superintendent, two thousand five hundred dollars; to the treasurer, the assayer, the melter and refiner, and the coiner, each two thousand dollars; for the branches at Charlotte and at Dahlonega, to the superintendent two thousand dollars, and to the assayer and the coiner, each fifteen hundred dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act to establish branches of the mint of the United States," approved the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five, as is inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Approved February 13, 1837.

AN ACT to suspend certain provisos of "An act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," approved the fourteenth day of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-two.

Be it enacted, &c., That the provisos of the tenth and twelfth clauses of the second section of the act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports, passed July the fourteenth, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, be, and the same are hereby, suspended until the close of the next session of Congress.

Approved March 1, 1837.

AN ACT to extend the jurisdiction of the district court of the United States for the district of Arkansas.

Be it enacted, &c., That the district court of the United States for the district of Arkansas shall have the same jurisdiction and power, in all respects whatever, that was given to the several district courts of the United States by an act of Congress approved March thirtieth, eighteen hundred and two, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," or by any subsequent acts of Congress, concerning crimes, offences, or misdemeanors, which may be committed against the laws of the United States in any town, settlement, or territory belonging to any Indian tribe in amity with the United States, of which any other district court of the United States may have jurisdiction.

Approved March 1, 1837.

AN ACT making appropriations for the support of the army for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the support of the army during the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven; that is to say:

For the pay of the army, one million ninety thousand one hundred and thirteen dollars.

For the subsistence of officers, three hundred and thirty-two thousand six hundred and thirty-eight dollars.

For forage of officers' horses, seventy thousand nine hundred and eighty-seven dollars.

For clothing for officers' servants, twenty-six thousand five hundred and fifty dollars.

For payments in lieu of clothing to discharged soldiers, thirty thousand dollars.

For subsistence, exclusive of that of officers, nine hundred and thirteen thousand four hundred and forty-five dollars, including the sum of three hundred and five thousand three hundred and seventy-two dollars for the subsistence of the volunteers and militia called out for preventing or suppressing Indian hostilities.

For clothing of the army, camp and garrison equipage, cooking utensils, and hospital furniture, two hundred and six thousand nine hundred and forty dollars.

For the medical and hospital department, thirty-eight thousand five hundred dollars.

For the regular supplies furnished by the quartermaster's department, consisting of fuel, forage, straw, stationary, and printing, two hundred and eight thousand dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following sums of money be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, on the requisition of the Secretary of War, and, so far as shall be necessary, the same shall be expended for the following purposes, to wit:

For the pay, travelling, clothing for six months, and other legal expenses of the Tennessee volunteers, mustered into the service of the United States under the requisition of General Gaines, under date of April eight, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, and the proclamation of Governor Cannon of twenty-eighth of the same month, and approved by the Secretary of War on the ninth of May, by direction of the President of the United States, one hundred thousand dollars: Provided, That such of said volunteers as volunteered under the proclamation of Governor Cannon of the sixth of June or twentieth of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, and were mustered into the service of the United States, and are entitled to clothing under the act of May twenty-third, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, shall not be paid for clothing out of the aforesaid appropriation.

For pay, travelling, clothing, and other legal expenses of the Tennessee volunteers, mustered into the service of the United States, under the order of the Secretary of War of May twenty-fifth, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, and Governor Cannon's proclamation of June sixth, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, ninety-five thousand dollars.

For pay, travelling, clothing, and other legal expenses of the Tennessee volunteers, mustered into the service of the United States under General Gaines's requisition, under date of June twenty-eighth, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, and Governor Cannon's proclamation of July twentieth, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, thirty-five thousand three hundred and ten dollars.

For the liabilities incurred by Governor Cannon in raising money, so far as said money has been properly expended in the service of the United States on account of the aforesaid volunteers, thirteen thousand five hundred dollars.

For pay due the executive staff of the Governor of Tennessee, while actually engaged in obtaining, organizing, mustering, or marching volunteers, during the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, to the places of their rendezvous, or taking returns of said volunteers, three thousand dollars.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, directed to cause to be paid to the volunteers and militia of Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, including the companies in Mississippi, mustered into the service, who were duly called into service, and whose service was accepted by the Executives of the States respectively, during the summer of the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, under requisitions from the Secretary of War, or from generals commanding the troops of the United States, and who were discharged before marching, the amount of one month's pay, with all the allowances to which they would have been entitled if they had been in actual service during the period of one month; and that the same be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That eleven thousand six hundred and fifty dollars be appropriated for paying the rifle rangers, Coosada volunteers, and the independent blues, under the command of Major Holt, and for the payment of Major Holt and battalion staff, or so much of said sum as may be necessary for those purposes, be appropriated and paid on the presentation of the rolls of said companies and battalion staff to the Paymaster General, with evidence of the time they were in the service against the Creek Indians in the months of May and June, eighteen hundred and thirty-six.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That one thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for arming and equipping the militia of the United States, in addition to the appropriations heretofore made for that purpose.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That, for paying the claims of the State of Connecticut for the services of her militia during the late war, to be audited and settled by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, under the superintendence of the Secretary of War, in the following cases: first, where the militia of the said State were called out to repel actual invasion, or under a well-founded apprehension of invasion; provided their numbers were not in undue proportion to the exigency; secondly, where they were called out by the authority of the State, and afterwards recognised by the Federal Government; and thirdly, where they were called out by, and served under, the requisition of the President of the United States, or of any officer thereof, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, if so much be necessary for that purpose, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That, to pay all the claims of North Carolina for the services of her militia during the late war with Great Britain, in the cases enumerated in the act approved the thirty-first May, eighteen hundred and thirty, entitled "An act to authorize the payment of the claims of the State of Massachusetts for certain services of her militia during the late war," and also the claims of said State for disbursements in the purchase of munitions or other supplies on account of the war, and expended therein, the sum of thirty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated.

Approved March 1, 1837.

AN ACT respecting discriminating duties upon Dutch and Belgian vessels and their cargoes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the same duties shall be levied and collected in the ports of the United States, on Belgian vessels and their cargoes, which are now levied and collected on Dutch vessels and their cargoes; but nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prevent the President of the United States from enforcing, whenever he may deem proper, both against Dutch and Belgian vessels, or either of them, and their cargoes, the provisions of the third section of the act entitled "An act concerning discriminating duties of tonnage and imposts," approved the seventh day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four.

Approved March 2, 1837.

AN ACT making an additional appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven.

Be it enacted, &c., That the further sum of two millions of dollars shall be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray any expenses which have been, or may be incurred, in preventing or suppressing the hostilities of any Indians; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, conformably to the acts of Congress of the 19th of March and the 2d of July last, and of the acts therein referred to.

Approved March 2, 1837.

AN ACT to provide for the enlistment of boys for the naval service, and to extend the term of the enlistment of seamen.

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful to enlist boys for the navy, with the consent of their parents or guardians, not being under thirteen nor over eighteen years of age, to serve until they shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years; and it shall be lawful to enlist other persons for the navy, to serve for a period not exceeding five years, unless sooner discharged by direction of the President of the United States;

and so much of an act entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to amend the act authorizing the employment of an additional naval force,'" approved the fifteenth May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, as is inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall be, and is hereby, repealed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That when the time of service of any person enlisted for the navy shall expire, while he is on board any of the public vessels of the United States employed on foreign service, it shall be the duty of the commanding officer of the fleet, squadron, or vessel in which such person may be, to send him to the United States in some public or other vessel, unless his detention shall be essential to the public interests, in which case the said officer may detain him until the vessel in which he shall be serving shall return to the United States; and it shall be the duty of said officer immediately to make report to the Navy Department of such detention and the causes thereof.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That such persons as may be detained after the expiration of their enlistment, under the next preceding section of this act, shall be subject, in all respects, to the laws and regulations for the government of the navy, until their return to the United States; and all such persons as shall be so detained, and all such as shall voluntarily re-enlist, to serve until the return of the vessel in which they shall be serving, and their regular discharge therefrom in the United States, shall, while so detained, and while so serving under their re-enlistment, receive an addition of one-fourth to their former pay.

Approved March 2, 1837.

AN ACT concerning pilots.

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall and may be lawful for the master or commander of any vessel coming into or going out of any port situate upon waters which are the boundary between two States, to employ any pilot duly licensed or authorized by the laws of either of the States bounded on the said waters, to pilot said vessel to or from said port: any law, usage, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

Approved March 2, 1837.

AN ACT to extend for a longer period the several acts now in force for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the act entitled "An act for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States," passed on the second day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one, and an act in addition thereto, passed on the fourteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, and an act to revive and amend the said acts, passed on the seventh day of June, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-four, be, and the same are hereby, extended and continued in force for three years, from and after the passage of this act.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the said several acts shall apply to cases of insolvency which shall have occurred on or before the first day of January last.

Approved March 2, 1837.

AN ACT to incorporate the Howard Institution of the city of Washington.

Be it enacted, &c., That William W. Seaton, Archibald Henderson, Matthew St. Clair Clarke, William A. Bradley, John Coyle, George Gillis, N. B. Van Zandt, Richmond Johnson, John Nourse, Michael Nourse, B. F. Rittenhouse, Lewis H. Machen, Rezin Orme, Peter W. Galaudet, Jacob Gideon, George Stettinius, William C. Orme, John P. Ingle, William Brent, John G. Whitwell, John Shackford, C. T. Coote, Thomas Blagden, Griffith Coombe, William Speiden, William Doughty, Marmaduke Dove, and G. D. Hanson, and all other persons who have contributed to the fund of the Howard Institution of the city of Washington, each in a subscription of an annual sum of at least one dollar, and all who may hereafter contribute to the said funds in a like annual subscription of a sum not less than one dollar, shall be, and are hereby, made, constituted, and declared to be, a corporation and body politic in law and in fact, to have continuance forever under the name, style, and title, of the Howard Institution of the city of Washington.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all and singular the lands, tenements, rents, legacies, annuities, rights, privileges, goods, and chattels, that may hereafter be given, granted, sold, devised, or bequeathed to the said Howard Institution, be, and they are hereby, vested in and confirmed to the said corporation; and that they may purchase, take, receive, and enjoy, any lands, tenements, rents, annuities, rights, or privileges, or any goods, chattels, or other effects of what kind or nature soever, which shall or may hereafter be given, granted, sold, bequeathed, or devised, unto the said institution, or unto any trustee for the use of the said institution, by any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, capable of making such grant, and to dispose of the same for the benefit of said corporation: Provided, The amount of property held by said institution shall, at no time, exceed the amount of twenty thousand dollars.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation, by the name and style aforesaid, be, and shall be hereafter capable, in law and equity, to sue and be sued, to plead and be impleaded, within the District of Columbia and elsewhere, in as effectual manner as other persons or corporations can sue or be sued.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That such persons as shall be officers of the said Howard Institution at the time of the passing of this act, shall be continued to be such until the first Tuesday in October next, on which day such of the persons hereby incorporated as shall then, or within a year preceding that day, contribute one dollar to the support of the said institution, and be or become a subscriber of one dollar or more per annum towards the same, and shall assemble at the house now belonging to the said institution at such hour as shall be directed by the board, shall proceed to elect a president, a first and second vice president, a treasurer and secretary, and twenty-four managers—four from each ward of the city of Washington, for the term of one year, who shall constitute the board of managers of the said Howard Institution of the city of Washington; and in like manner, on the first Tuesday of October in each year thereafter, the like officers shall be elected for the same term of one year, at such hour and place as shall have been previously designated by the board of managers, of which time and place at least two days' notice shall be given by publication in some newspaper printed in the city of Washington; and if, from any cause, an election shall not be held on the day of the month herein appointed, then an election may be held on any other day, of which the like notice shall be given, and those persons in office shall so continue until their successors shall be elected; and at all such elections, every contributor of not less than one dollar, in the manner as aforementioned, shall be entitled to one vote; but those who contribute, by a yearly subscription, a larger sum, shall be entitled to a greater number of votes, to be regulated by the by-laws of the board; and any vacancies which may occur in the board by resignation, death, removal, or otherwise, shall be supplied by the board of managers in such manner as the by-laws of the board may direct.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the object of the said Howard Institution of the city of Washington shall be to afford relief to the indigent females of the city of Washington, by providing work for those who may desire it, and by procuring for them fuel and other necessities of life on the most reasonable terms, and to adopt such other means as may be found expedient for bettering the condition of the poor of the said city.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That all the business of said corporation hereby created shall be transacted by the board of managers, except the election of the said board, as hereinbefore provided for; the number of the board to form a quorum to transact the business of the said corporation to be regulated by the by-laws of said institution. At all meetings thereof the president, if present, shall preside; and if he be absent, then one of the vice presidents, if either of them be present; and if neither of these shall be present at any meeting of the board, then the members present shall appoint one of their number as president pro tempore.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the board of managers shall have power to adopt and use a common seal as the seal of this corporation, and to alter or exchange the same at their pleasure. They shall have power to adopt all by-laws which they may think necessary for the management of the concerns of the institution, and which shall not be inconsistent with the laws of the United States, or the laws of the District of Columbia for the time being. They shall appoint such officers, agents, and servants, as may be necessary to carry on the business of the institution, and regulate the compensation to be paid to them for their services; and they may dismiss any of them at their pleasure, and appoint others in their stead, as often as they shall think fit. They shall keep a journal of their proceedings, in which shall be recorded every by-law which may be adopted. They shall adopt such checks and regulations as may appear necessary for the security of the funds and property of the institution; and shall annually make a report of the affairs and condition of the institution for the preceding year.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for Congress, at any time hereafter, to alter, amend, modify, or repeal this act.

Approved March 2, 1837.

AN ACT to provide for the adjustment of title and final disposition of the four reserved sections in the tract of country allotted to the Tombeckbee Association for the encouragement of the cultivation of the vine and olive.

Be it enacted, &c., That all persons who became entitled, under the contract entered into on the eighth day of January, eighteen hundred and nineteen, by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the part of the United States, and Charles Villar, agent of the Tombeckbee Association, in pursuance of "An act to set apart and dispose of certain public lands for the encouragement of the cultivation of the vine and olive," approved third March, eighteen hundred and seventeen, to an allotment or share of the four sections of land reserved for the small allotments, and designated as sections seven, eighteen, nineteen, and thirty, in township eighteen, range three east, their heirs, devisees, or assigns, who shall have complied with the conditions of settlement and cultivation on such allotment, as required by said contract, or shall have been in the actual settlement and cultivation of his or her allotment within said four sections, or a part thereof, before or on the thirty-first day of October, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, as provided by the act of the nineteenth day of February, eighteen hundred and thirty-three, shall, on producing to the register and receiver of the land district in which said lands are situated, satisfactory evidence of title to such allotment, and of settlement and cultivation on the same as aforesaid, and paying one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre for the land, receive a patent for the same: Provided, Such proof shall be filed and payment made within six months from the passage of this act: And provided, further, That the expense of surveying any such allotment shall be defrayed by the person or persons claiming the same.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any remainder of said four sections not disposed of by the first section of this act shall be subject to entry at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, by the trustees of the Demopolis Female Academy, in trust for the use and benefit of said institution.

Approved March 2, 1837.

AN ACT to organize the several Fire Companies in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passage of this act, the fire companies of Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, and those which may hereafter be formed in either of the said cities, shall, when so formed, severally have power to frame their own constitution, and adopt by-laws for their own regulation, and to elect their own officers, who, and the members of the several companies, shall be exempt from the performance of military duty in time of peace, so long as they shall continue active members thereof; and the certificate of the several presidents of the said companies, attested by the secretary, shall be sufficient evidence of membership: Provided, That no company now formed, or hereafter to be formed, as aforesaid, shall have the benefit of this act, until it shall first obtain a fire apparatus of the value of at least five hundred dollars: And, provided, A company possessing an apparatus of the value of five hundred dollars, shall not exempt more than seventy-five; and a company possessing an apparatus of the value of one thousand dollars and upwards, shall not exempt more than one hundred.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the corporate authorities in each of the said cities shall, annually, appoint an inspector, whose duty it shall be to examine the condition of the fire apparatus belonging to each fire company at least once in every month, and to report its state to a fire department, to be composed of the presidents of the respective fire companies in each of the said cities, who are hereby constituted a fire department for that purpose, which shall sit monthly, at the town-house in the city to which they belong. And if the said inspector shall report that the fire apparatus of any one of the said fire companies is so defective or out of repair as to be of less value than five hundred dollars, or unfit for service, and the company or companies whose apparatus shall be thus reported to be so depreciated in value or out of repair, shall permit the same to continue so for one calendar month, the said company or companies shall thereupon forfeit all the rights, privileges, and immunities, granted by this act; and it shall be the duty of the said inspector to communicate this fact to the adjutant of the regiment of the city in which such company or companies may belong.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That each of the said fire companies shall have power to enforce obedience to its constitution and by-laws by fine and forfeiture; and to collect all such fines by warrant, to be issued by a justice of the peace in the city where such company belong, in the name of the said company; and the certificate of the president of such company, that the person so fined has been fined for disobedience to the constitution or by-laws (as the case may be) of fire company in ——— city, attested by the secretary of the said company, shall be sufficient evidence for the magistrate to issue his warrant, and after having the party before him, to enter up judgment, and issue execution thereon: Provided, Proof of such fine shall be made by the record thereof produced before the justice, and proved by the secretary; and, if either of the said companies shall expel any member thereof, he, the said member so expelled, shall thereupon forfeit all the rights, privileges, and immunities, granted by this act; and it shall be the duty of the secretary of the company from which the said member shall be so expelled, immediately to inform the captain of the militia company within whose limits the said member shall reside, that he has been so expelled; and the said expelled member shall thereupon be enrolled in the said militia company, and compelled to perform military duty, if otherwise liable to do military duty.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all and every sum and sums of money collected under the authority of this act, shall be paid over by the officer or other person collecting the same, to the treasurer of the company in the name of which the warrant shall have been issued, or money collected; and upon such officer or other person failing so to pay over the same, the said treasurer may recover the same by warrant or suit, in his own name, for the use of the said fire company, in the same manner as private debts are now recovered by law. And each and every of the said fire companies now existing, or which may hereafter be formed, as aforesaid, shall, each for itself, provide a fund for the relief of such member or members of such company, who shall or may receive any corporeal hurt or injury, or contract any disease at, or in consequence of, any fire, and be unable to provide medical aid, or whose family or families may be dependent upon his or their daily labor for support, and for the relief of the family or families of any member or members of such fire company, who shall or may be killed at, or die in consequence of, any injury received, or disease contracted at, or in consequence of, any fire, and whose family or families may have been dependent upon his or their daily labor for support; and the treasurer of the said company shall, after having paid all the expenses which the said company shall have lawfully incurred, pay over to the said fund the residue of all fines collected under the authority of this act.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere with the right of the corporate authorities of the several cities aforesaid "to provide for the prevention and extinguishment of fires;" and it is hereby declared to be the true intent and meaning of the several acts of incorporation of the several cities aforesaid, to give to the corporate authorities thereof full power and lawful authority to make all necessary provisions for the prevention and extinguishment of fires; for the preservation of order and protection of property at any fire; for the removal from any fire of suspicious persons, and those who are disobedient to the regulations of the said several corporations; for the punishment, by fine and imprisonment, of such person or persons as, being present at, refuse to assist, and obey the commands of the proper officer, in extinguishing any fire; for the removal of such property as may be necessary to be removed, to prevent and arrest the progress of any fires; and to aid, protect, and obtain obedience to the officers in command of the several fire companies, and to protect the members thereof while in the discharge of their duty at any fire.

Approved March 2, 1837.

AN ACT for the relief of Catharine Myott.

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper officers be, and they are hereby, authorized to cause the east half of section fourteen, in township forty-four north, range one east, third principal meridian, in the State of Illinois, to be set apart and designated for Catharine Myott, as part of the reservation to which she is entitled under the provision of the treaty made at Prairie du Chien on the first day of August, eighteen hundred and twenty-nine.

Approved March 2, 1837.

AN ACT confirming the claim of the heirs of Michael Dragon to certain tracts of land therein mentioned.

Be it enacted, &c., That the claims of Andria Demetry, or the heirs of Michael Dragon, deceased, to three several tracts of land situate on the bay of Saint Louis, in the State of Louisiana, the titles to which were derived from the Spanish Government of that country, and containing together five thousand nine hundred and sixty-eight arpens, be, and the same hereby are, confirmed, in conformity with the report made by the register and receiver of the land district of St. Stephen's, acting as commissioners under the third section of the act approved the second March, eighteen hundred and twenty-nine, entitled "An act confirming the report of the register and receiver of the land office for the district of St. Stephen's, in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes," dated the sixteenth of February, eighteen hundred and thirty-four: Provided, This confirmation does not interfere with any title or right, if such exist, to any part of the said land, acquired by any individual or individuals under the laws of the United States.

Approved March 2, 1837.

AN ACT to amend an act approved the second of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, for the relief of Samuel Smith, Linn McGhee, and Semoice, Creek Indians; and also, an act passed the second July, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, for the relief of Susan Marlow.

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the acts for the relief of Samuel Smith, Linn McGhee, Semoice, and Susan Marlow, as restrict them to the entry of one entire section of land, be, and the same is hereby repealed; and the said Samuel Smith, Linn McGhee, Semoice, and Susan Marlow, are hereby authorized to enter, without payment, and by legal subdivisions, a quantity of land not exceeding six hundred and forty acres each, which is subject to entry at private sale.

Approved March 2, 1837.

AN ACT making appropriations for the naval service for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven.

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be appropriated for the naval service for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, in addition to the unexpended balances of former appropriations, to wit:

For pay of commissioned, warrant, and petty officers, and of seamen, two millions four hundred and fifty-four thousand six hundred and eighty-six dollars.

To enable the President, provided he should deem it necessary, to offer a bounty for the purpose of promoting the enlistment of seamen, seventy-two thousand dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to the collectors, deputy collectors, naval officers, surveyors, and their respective clerks, together with the weighers, gaugers, measurers, and markers of the several ports of the United States, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as will give to the said officers, respectively, the same compensation in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, according to the importations of that year, as they would have been entitled to receive if the act of the fourteenth of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, had not gone into effect: Provided, That no officer shall receive, under this act, a greater annual salary or compensation than was paid to such officer for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two; and that in no case shall the compensation of any other officers than collectors, naval officers, surveyors, and clerks, whether by salaries, fees, or otherwise, exceed the sum of fifteen hundred dollars each per annum; nor shall the union of any two or more of those offices in one person, entitle him to receive more than that sum per annum: Provided, further, That the said collectors, naval officers, and surveyors shall render an account quarterly to the Treasury; and the other officers herein named or referred to shall render an account quarterly to the respective collectors of the customs where they are employed, to be forwarded to the Treasury, of all the fees and emoluments whatever by them respectively received, and of all expenses incidental to their respective offices; which accounts shall be rendered on oath or affirmation, and shall be in such form, and supported by such proofs, to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, as will, in his judgment, best enforce the provisions of this section, and show its operation and effect: Provided, also, That in the event of any act being passed by Congress at the present session to regulate and fix salaries or compensation of the respective officers of the customs, then this section shall operate and extend to the time such act goes into effect, and no longer: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to extend to the collectors at such other ports where a surplus of emoluments have been accounted for and paid into the Treasury in the year eighteen hundred and thirty-two, the privilege granted to the collector of New York; to take effect from the first day of January last.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the clerks in the Departments of State, Treasury, Navy, and War, and of the two Houses of Congress, and the librarians of Congress, whose salaries are less than two thousand dollars, shall, in addition thereto, be allowed the following increase of annual compensation, from the first day of January last, to the end of the next session of Congress, viz: such of said clerks whose annual compensation does not exceed one thousand dollars, an addition of twenty per cent. thereto; such of said clerks whose annual compensation exceeds one thousand dollars, an addition of ten per cent. thereto; and twenty per cent. in addition to the salaries of messengers and assistant messengers employed in the respective offices, and the library of Congress; the amount of increase of compensation provided for in this section, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be so construed as to affect the salaries of any clerks whose salaries have been fixed by any law of the last or present session of Congress: Provided, That no further extra allowance be given for any extra services performed by them under any law or resolution of Congress.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT supplementary to the act entitled "An act to amend the judicial system of the United States."

Be it enacted, &c., That the Supreme Court of the United States shall hereafter consist of a chief justice, and eight associate judges, any five of whom shall constitute a quorum; and for this purpose there shall be appointed two additional justices of said court, with the like powers, and to take the same oaths, perform the same duties, and be entitled to the same salary, as the other associate judges. Hereafter, the districts of Vermont, Connecticut, and New York shall constitute the second circuit; the district of New Jersey, the eastern and western districts of Pennsylvania, shall constitute the third circuit; the district of Maryland and the district of Delaware shall constitute the fourth circuit; the districts of Virginia and the district of North Carolina shall constitute the fifth circuit; the districts of South Carolina and Georgia shall constitute the sixth circuit; the districts of Ohio, Illinois, and Michigan shall constitute the seventh circuit; and the circuit courts shall be held at Columbus, in the Ohio district, on the third Mondays in May and December; at Detroit, in the Michigan district, on the fourth Monday in June; at Indianapolis, in the Indiana district, on the first Monday in December; at Vandalia, in the Illinois district, on the last Monday in November, in each year; the districts of Kentucky, east and west Tennessee, and Missouri, shall form and be called the eighth circuit; and the districts of Alabama, the eastern district of Louisiana, the district of Mississippi, and the district of Arkansas shall form and be called the ninth circuit.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the sessions of said circuit courts shall be held twice in each year in the following districts, to wit: commencing in the eastern district of Louisiana, at New Orleans, on the third Monday of May and on the third Monday of November, annually; in the district of Mississippi, at Jackson, on the first Monday of May and on the first Monday of November, annually; in the southern district of Alabama, at Mobile, on the second Monday of April and the second Monday of October, annually; in the western district of Pennsylvania, at Pittsburgh, on the third Mondays of May and November, annually; in the district of Delaware, at Newcastle, on the Tuesday next following the fourth Monday of May, and at Dover on the Tuesday next following the third Monday of October, annually; and in the district of Maryland, at Baltimore, on the first Monday of April and the first Monday of October, annually; in the northern district of New York, at Albany, on the second Tuesday of June and the third Tuesday of October, annually; and there shall be holden a term of said circuit courts, annually, at Lewisburg, in the western district of Virginia, commencing on the first Monday of August; at Huntsville, in the northern district of Alabama, commencing on the first Monday of June; at St. Louis, in the district of Missouri, commencing on the first Monday of April; and at Little Rock, in the district of Arkansas, on the fourth Monday of March; and that no process, recognizance, or bail bond, returnable to the next term of either of said courts, shall be avoided or impaired, or affected by this change, as to the commencement of said term; but that all process, bail bonds, and recognizances returnable to the next term of either of said courts, shall be returnable and returned to the court next held, according to this act, in the same manner as if so made returnable on the face thereof, and shall have full effect accordingly; and that all continuances in either of said courts shall be from the last term to the court appointed by this act, and the day herein appointed for the commencement of the next session thereof: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the judge of the northern district of New York from holding the courts at Utica, nor the judge of the western district of Pennsylvania from holding the courts at Williamsport, at the same time and with the same power and jurisdiction as heretofore.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That so much of any act or acts of Congress as vests in the district courts of the United States for the districts of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Arkansas, the eastern district of Louisiana, the district of Mississippi, the northern district of New York, the western district of Virginia, and the western district of Pennsylvania, and the districts of Alabama, or either of them, the power and jurisdiction of circuit courts, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and there shall hereafter be circuit courts held for said districts by the chief or associate justices of the Supreme Court, assigned or allotted to the circuit to which such districts may respectively belong, and the district judges of such districts severally and respectively; either of whom shall constitute a quorum; which circuit courts, and the judges thereof, shall have like powers and exercise like jurisdiction as other circuit courts and the judges thereof; and the said district courts, and the judges thereof, shall have like powers and exercise like jurisdiction as the district courts, and the judges thereof, in the other circuits. From all judgments and decrees rendered in the district courts of the United States for the western district of Louisiana, writs of error and appeals shall lie to the circuit court in the other district in said State, in the same manner as from decrees and judgments rendered in the districts within which a circuit court is provided by this act.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all actions, suits, prosecutions, causes, pleas, process, and other proceedings, relative to any cause, civil or criminal, (which might have been brought, and could have been, originally, cognizable in a circuit court,) now pending in or returnable to the several district courts of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Mississippi, Arkansas, Michigan, the eastern district of Louisiana, the districts of Alabama, the northern district of New York, the western district of Pennsylvania, and western district of Virginia, acting as circuit courts on the first day of April next, shall be, and are hereby declared to be, respectively transferred, returnable, and continued to, the several circuit courts constituted by this act, to be holden within the said districts respectively; and shall be heard, tried, and determined therein, in the same manner as if originally brought, entered, prosecuted, or had, in such circuit courts. And the said circuit courts shall be governed by the same laws and regulations as apply to the other circuit courts of the United States; and the clerks of the said courts, respectively, shall perform the same duties, and shall be entitled to receive the same fees and emoluments, which are by law established for the clerks of the other circuit courts of the United States. The allotment of their chief justice and the associate justices of the said Supreme Court to the several circuits shall be made as heretofore.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all acts and provisions inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT to authorize the proper officers of the Treasury Department to credit the account of the Treasurer of the United States with the amount of unavailable funds standing to his debit on the books of the Treasury, to transfer the amount of the debit of banks and individuals indebted for the same, and to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise and settle said claims.

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized to credit the account of the Treasurer of the United States with the amount of the unavailable funds, whether charged to John Campbell, or his predecessors, and to transfer the amount to the debit of the banks and individuals, respectively, that may be indebted for the same.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to compromise and finally settle the claims of the United States, of the above description, against said banks and individuals who have proved insolvent, or failed to make punctual payments, on such terms and conditions as he may deem most conducive to the interests of the United States: Provided, That this act shall not authorize any compromise of the debt due from the Alleghany Bank of Pennsylvania.

AN ACT to amend an act entitled "An act for laying off the towns of Fort Madison and Burlington, in the county of Des Moines, and the towns of Bellevue, Du Buque, and Peru, in the county of Du Buque, and Mineral Point, in the county of Iowa, Territory of Wisconsin, and for other purposes," approved July second, eighteen hundred and thirty-six.

Be it enacted, &c., That all acts and duties required to be done and performed by the Surveyor for the Territory of Wisconsin, under the act to which this is an amendment, shall be done by a board of commissioners of three in number, any two of whom shall be a quorum to do business; said commissioners to be appointed by the President of the United States, and shall, previous to their entering upon the discharge of their duties, take an oath or affirmation to perform the same faithfully and impartially: Provided, That the action of the commissioners appointed under the present act shall not interfere with any of the acts performed by the Surveyor General, prior to the time of the passage hereof, in pursuance of instructions under the act to which this is amendatory.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners shall have power to hear evidence and determine all claims to lots arising under the act to which this is an amendment; and for this purpose, the said commissioners are authorized to administer all oaths that may be necessary, and reduce to writing all the evidence in support of claims to pre-emption presented for their consideration; and when all the testimony shall have been heard and considered, the said commissioners shall file with the proper register and receiver for the district within which the towns are situated respectively, the testimony in each case, together with a certificate in favor of each person having the right of pre-emption under the provisions of the act to which this is amendatory; and upon making payment to the proper receiver of public moneys for the lot or lots to which such person is entitled, the receiver shall grant a receipt therefor, and the register issue certificates of purchase, to be transmitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as in other cases of the sale of public lands.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the proper register and receiver of public moneys, after the board of commissioners have heard and determined all the cases of pre-emption under the act to which this is an amendment, shall expose the residue of the lots to public sale to the highest bidder, after advertising the same in three public newspapers at least three months prior to the day of sale, in the same manner as is provided for the sale of public lands in other cases; and after paying the commissioners the compensation hereafter allowed them, and all other expenses incident to the said survey and sale, the receiver of the land office shall pay over the residue of the money he may have received from the sale of lots aforesaid, by pre-emption as well as at public auction, into the hands of the trustees of the respective towns aforesaid, to be expended by them in the erection of public buildings, the construction of suitable wharves, and the improvement of the streets in the said towns of Fort Madison, Burlington, Belleview, Du Buque, Peru, and Mineral Point.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the commissioners appointed to carry this act into effect, shall be paid by the receiver of public moneys of the proper land district, six dollars each, per day, for their services, for every day they are necessarily employed.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT to continue in force for a limited time the act entitled "An act to carry into effect a convention between the United States and Spain."

Be it enacted, &c., That the provisions of the act entitled "An act to carry into effect a convention between the United States and Spain," approved on the seventh day of June, one thousand eight hundred and thirty six, be, and the same are hereby, extended until the first day of February, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight; and the commissioner appointed under the said act shall, on or before the said day, terminate his duties.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT for the more equitable administration of the navy pension fund.

Be it enacted, &c., That if any officer, seaman, or marine have died or may hereafter die, in the naval service, leaving a widow, and if no widow, a child or children, such widow, and if no widow, such child or children shall be entitled to receive half the monthly pay to which the deceased would have been entitled, under the acts regulating the pay of the navy, in force on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five, to commence from the time of the death of such officer, seaman, or marine; but in case of the death or intermarriage of such widow, the half-pay shall go to the child or children of such deceased officer, seaman, or marine: Provided, That the half-pay granted to the child or children shall cease on their death, or on their attaining the age of twenty-one years.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the pensions which may have been granted, or which may hereafter be granted, to officers, seamen, and marines, in the naval service, disabled by wounds or injuries received while in the line of their duty, shall be considered to commence from the time of their being so disabled, and that the amount of pension to which said officers, seamen, and marines, may be entitled, shall be regulated according to the pay of the navy as it existed on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all acts, and parts of acts which may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby repealed, so far as they may elate thereto.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to reservations of land under the fourteenth article of the treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty, with the Choctaw Indians.

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three commissioners, whose duty it shall be to meet in the State of Mississippi, at such time and place as the President shall appoint and designate, and there proceed to ascertain the name of every Choctaw Indian who was the head of an Indian family at the date of the treaty at Dancing Rabbit creek, who has not already obtained a reservation under said treaty, and who can show by satisfactory evidence, that he or she complied or offered to comply with all the requisites of the fourteenth article of said treaty, to entitle him or her to a reservation under said article; and also the number and names of all the unmarried children of such heads of families, who formed a part of the family and were over ten years of age, and likewise the number and names of the children of such heads of families as were under ten years of age, and report to the President, to be, by him, laid before Congress, all the names of such Indians, and the different sections of land to which such heads of families were respectively entitled, together with the opinions of the commissioners, and whether any part of said lands have been sold by the Government, and the proofs applicable to each case.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That before entering upon their duties, each of said commissioners shall, before some judge or justice of the peace, take an oath faithfully to discharge the duties imposed by this act.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That said commissioners are hereby authorized to appoint a secretary, whose duty it shall be to record correctly all the proceedings of said board, and faithfully preserve the same, as well as all depositions and other papers filed before said board, and who shall take an oath to discharge the duties imposed on him by this act.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That upon the request of the commissioners, it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the State of Mississippi to attend said board, and give his assistance in procuring the attendance of witnesses, and his aid and advice in their examination, the better to enable the commissioners to ascertain the facts correctly in each case.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That each of said commissioners shall receive, while in the discharge of the duties hereby imposed, a salary at the rate of three thousand dollars per annum, the secretary a salary at the rate of fifteen hundred dollars per annum, and the district attorney a salary at the rate of two thousand dollars per annum, to be paid quarterly out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That said commissioners shall have full power to summon and cause to come before them, such witnesses as they may deem necessary, and to have them examined on oath, and if any witness shall testify falsely, with an intention to mislead said commissioners, such witness shall be guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury, and shall, upon conviction before any jurisdiction having cognizance thereof, suffer the punishment by law inflicted on those guilty of that offence.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to sanction what is called contingent locations which have been made by George M. Martin, for the benefit of such Indians as were supposed to have been entitled to other lands, which have been sold by the United States; such contingent locations having been made without any legal authority: it being the true intent of this act to reserve to Congress the power of doing that which may appear just when a correct knowledge of all the facts is obtained.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force to the first day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, next, and no longer.

Approved March 3, 1837.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That before any of the improvements aforesaid are commenced, the Board of Navy Commissioners shall cause an examination to be made for the purpose of ascertaining whether the safety of navigation requires any additional facilities, and if so, what is most suitable for each place needing such additional facilities, and thereupon to report their opinion in regard to all such places as speedily as may be to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall proceed with the works so recommended; but if the said Board, after causing such examination to be made, shall be of opinion that any of said improvements are not needed to facilitate the navigation, or that the navigation is so inconsiderable as not to justify the proposed works, or that the same are inexpedient from any cause, no further proceeding shall be had, and their opinions, with the facts, shall be reported to Congress.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to adopt the improvements in lamps and lanterns of light-houses, and the mode of warning the same, invented by Isaac Dunham, if, in his opinion, after due examination and trial thereof, (if necessary,) said improvements shall be deemed of utility in respect to the saving of expense in repairs and support, or in respect to improving the lights: Provided, The right to adopt said improvements in the light-houses and light-boats of the United States can be obtained on terms which the Secretary shall deem reasonable.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT to authorize and sanction the sales of reserves, provided for Creek Indians in the treaty of March twenty-four, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States may, and he is hereby authorized to, cause all the reserves belonging to the Creek Indians by virtue of the provisions of the treaty of March twenty-four, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, which shall remain unsold on the fourth day of April next, to be sold at public auction in the Creek country; after giving at least sixty days' notice of the time, place, and terms of sale in the public prints, and to cause patents to be issued to the purchasers of said reserves.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States may, and he is hereby authorized to, confirm the sales by the widow, the widow and children, the children, or the lawful administrator of Creek Indians who have died, or who may die, prior to the fourth day of April next, without having legally disposed of said reserves, and to receive the purchase-money, or such portions of it as may not have been paid to the persons entitled to it, and to cause patents to be issued therefor to the purchasers: Provided, That sales made by lawful administrators shall be entitled to a preference over sales made by widows and children."

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President may, and he is hereby authorized to, pay the persons entitled thereto, the money which may be received from the purchasers of reserves under the authority given in the two preceding sections, at such times, and in such amounts, as he shall deem best for the parties concerned; or, if he think proper, to invest the whole or any part of said purchase-money in stocks, and pay the interest to the persons entitled, in such amounts, and in such manner, as, in his opinion, will be most advantageous for them: Provided, That he may cause the principal of the sum or sums so invested to be paid to the persons entitled thereto, whenever he may think proper: And provided, further, That the provisions of this act shall be executed under such regulations and restrictions as the President may prescribe.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That it may be lawful for the President of the United States to cause the sum of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre to be paid to the Creek Indians whose names were omitted to be entered on the census-roll taken under the treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty-two, and to those whose names appear on said roll, but for whom no locations have been made, who shall appear, from proper evidence, to be justly entitled to reservations under the provisions of said treaty: Provided, That the sums thus payable under this section may be invested in stocks upon the same terms and conditions, and under the same regulations and restrictions, as are hereinbefore prescribed in respect to moneys payable under the first and second sections of this act: Provided, further, That no transfer by the person entitled under this section shall be valid.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the three first sections of this act, the sum of ten thousand dollars be and the same is hereby appropriated, together with such sum as may be necessary to carry into effect the fourth section thereof.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT explanatory of the act entitled "An act granting half-pay to widows and orphans where their husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, &c., That the benefits of the third section of the act entitled "An act granting half pay to widows and orphans, where their husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," approved the fourth day of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, shall not be withheld from any widow, in consequence of her having married after the decease of the husband for whose services she may claim to be allowed a pension or annuity under said act: Provided, That she was a widow at the time it was passed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the widow of any person who continued in the service of the United States until the third day of November, seventeen hundred and eighty-three, and was married before that day, and while her husband was in such service, shall be entitled to the benefits of the third section of the aforesaid act.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions.

Be it enacted, &c., That the office of Commissioner of Pensions shall be and the same is hereby continued, until the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and forty.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That a Commissioner of Pensions shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and that he shall execute, under the direction of the Secretary of War, such duties in relation to the various pension laws as may be prescribed by the President.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said Commissioner shall receive an annual salary of three thousand dollars; and have the privilege of sending and receiving letters and packets by mail free of postage.

And that the sum of seventy thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the erection of a marine hospital in the city of New Orleans, in that part of said city which shall be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and for the purchase of lands on which to erect said marine hospital; and that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to select and cause to be purchased, for the use and benefit of sick seamen, boatmen, and all other navigators on the Western rivers and lakes, suitable sites for marine hospitals: Provided, That the number thereof shall not exceed for the river Mississippi three, for the river Ohio three, and for Lake Erie one; and to enable the President to make such selection and purchase, he may call to his aid one or more medical men of the army, not exceeding three in all, to examine and report on such sites, and to ascertain at what price the same can be had; and that the sum of fifteen thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to effect the purchase thereof, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and that suitable plans and estimates be prepared, under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the construction of said hospitals, and submitted to Congress, at the commencement of the next session thereof; and that the sum of ten thousand dollars be appropriated for the erection of a marine hospital in the city of Mobile: Provided, That the expenditures for the purchase of sites and the erection of hospitals at New Orleans and Mobile shall not exceed the amounts herein appropriated for these purposes; that from and after the first day of April next, all laws enacted whereby seamen are required to pay twenty cents a month, or their employers are required to retain that sum out of their wages, to create a fund for the sick and disabled seamen, shall be suspended for one year, during which no such exaction shall be made; and that instead of said tax there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, to be disbursed in the same manner as the sum above mentioned: Provided, however, That seamen and watermen who have not contributed to said fund, may receive relief to such extent, and under such regulations, as the President of the United States shall direct.

For continuing the improvement of the harbor of Baltimore, Maryland, fifteen thousand dollars.

For continuing the improvement of the navigation of Cape Fear river, below Wilmington, North Carolina, ten thousand dollars.

For opening a passage of fifty yards wide and seven feet deep at low water, between the town of Beaufort and Pamlico sound, North Carolina, and for improving New river, in addition to two sums of five thousand dollars each, appropriated at the last session of Congress for the harbor of Beaufort and for New river, twenty thousand dollars.

For continuing the improvements of the inland channel between St. Mary's and St. John's, Florida, five thousand dollars.

For continuing the improvement of the Cumberland river in Kentucky and Tennessee, according to the report of Col. Abert, United States engineer, dated February twenty-third, eighteen hundred and thirty-five, of the survey of said river, fifty-five thousand dollars.

For continuing the removal of obstructions in the Red river, sixty-five thousand dollars.

For continuing the improvement of the Ohio river between the falls and Pittsburg, sixty thousand dollars.

For continuing the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers from Louisville to New Orleans, sixty thousand dollars.

For continuing the works for the removal of the obstructions to the navigation of the Mississippi river at its mouth, two hundred and ten thousand dollars.

For continuing the works for the removal of the obstructions to the navigation of the Arkansas river, in addition to the unexpended balance of thirty-five thousand dollars, the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars.

For continuing the improvement of the Mississippi river above the mouth of the Ohio, and of the Missouri river, forty thousand dollars.

For the erection of a pier in the Mississippi river, near St. Louis, including the sum of fifteen thousand dollars appropriated for that purpose at the last session of Congress, fifty thousand dollars.

For improving the navigation of the Ohio, Missouri, and Mississippi rivers, and to replace the steam snag-boat Archimedes, sunk in the Mississippi river in November last, twenty-three thousand dollars.

For continuing the survey of Black and White rivers in Arkansas and Missouri, one thousand dollars.

For making a survey from the southern debouche of the Dismal Swamp canal, down the Pasquotank river to Elizabeth, thence to Croatan sound, Pamlico and other sounds, near the coast of North Carolina; and thence by the most practicable route to Winyaw bay, in South Carolina, with a view to determine the practicability of opening an inland communication for steam navigation from the Chesapeake bay to Charleston, South Carolina, ten thousand dollars.

For improving the harbor of New Brunswick, New Jersey, by removing the obstructions in the Raritan river, in addition to the appropriation of July four, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, six thousand nine hundred and sixty-three dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That when the corporate authorities of the town of Alexandria shall deposit the stock held by them in the Alexandria Canal Company, in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, with proper and competent instruments and conveyances in law to vest the same in the Secretary of the Treasury and his successors in office, for and on behalf of the United States, to be held in trust upon the same terms and conditions in all respects as the stocks held in the Chesapeake and Ohio canal by the several cities of this District were required to be held in and by virtue of the act approved on the seventh day of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, entitled "An act for the relief of the several corporate cities of the District of Columbia," that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to advance, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Alexandria and Canal Company, from time to time, as the progress of the work may require the same, such sums of money, not exceeding three hundred thousand dollars, as may be necessary to complete the said canal to the town and harbor of Alexandria: Provided, That the Alexandria Canal Company, in the construction of the remaining piers, abutments, and works of their aqueduct over the Potomac river, are hereby prohibited and restrained from throwing earth or clay into the open river, and are required, with the money furnished by this bill, to remove all earth and clay heretofore deposited by them in the river.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT in addition to the act to promote the progress of science and useful arts.

Be it enacted, &c., That any person who may be in possession of, or in any way interested in, any patent for an invention, discovery, or improvement, issued prior to the fifteenth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, or in an assignment of any patent, or interest therein, executed and recorded prior to the said fifteenth day of December, may, without charge, on presentation or transmission thereof to the Commissioner of Patents, have the same recorded anew in the Patent Office, together with the descriptions, specifications of claim and drawings annexed or belonging to the same; and it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to cause the same, or any authenticated copy of the of the original record, specification, or drawing which he may obtain, to be transcribed and copied into books of record to be kept for that purpose; and wherever a drawing was not originally annexed to the patent and referred to in the specification, any drawing produced as a delineation of the invention, being verified by oath in such manner as the Commissioner shall require, may be transmitted and placed on file or copied as aforesaid, together with the certificate of the oath; or such drawings may be made in the office, under the direction of the Commissioner, in conformity with the specification. And it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to take such measures as may be advised and determined by the Board of Commissioners provided for in the fourth section of this act, to obtain the patents, specifications, and copies aforesaid, for the purpose of being so transcribed and recorded. And it shall be the duty of each of the several clerks of the judicial courts of the United States, to transmit, as soon as may be, to the Commissioner of the Patent Office, a statement of all the authenticated copies of patents, descriptions, specifications, and drawings of inventions and discoveries made and executed prior to the aforesaid fifteenth day of December, which may be found on the files of his office; and also to make out and transmit to said Commissioner, for record as aforesaid, a certified copy of every such patent, description, specification, or drawing, which shall be specially required by said Commissioner.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That copies of such record and drawings, certified by the Commissioner, or, in his absence, by the chief clerk, shall be prima facie evidence of the particulars of the invention and of the patent granted therefor, in any judicial court of the United States, in all cases where copies of the original record or specification and drawings would be evidence, without proof of the loss of such originals; and no patent issued prior to the aforesaid fifteenth day of December shall, after the first day of June next, be received in evidence in any of the said courts in behalf of the patentee or other person who shall be in possession of the same, unless it shall have been so recorded anew, and a drawing of the invention, if separate from the patent, verified as aforesaid, deposited in the Patent Office; nor shall any written assignment of any such patent, executed and recorded prior to the said fifteenth day of December, be received in evidence in any of the said courts in behalf of the assignee or other person in possession thereof, until it shall have been so recorded anew.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall appear to the Commissioner that any patent was destroyed by the burning of the Patent Office building on the aforesaid fifteenth day of December, or was otherwise lost prior thereto, it shall be his duty, on application therefor by the patentee or other person interested therein, to issue a new patent for the same invention or discovery, bearing the date of the original patent, with his certificate thereon that it was made and issued pursuant to the provisions of this third section of this act, and shall enter the same of record: Provided, however, That before such patent shall be issued, the applicant therefor shall deposit in the Patent Office a duplicate, as near as may be, of the original model, drawings, and description, with specification of the invention or discovery, verified by oath, as shall be required by the Commissioner; and such patent and copies of such drawings and descriptions, duly certified, shall be admissible as evidence in any judicial court of the United States, and shall protect the rights of the patentee, his administrators, heirs, and assigns, to the extent only in which they would have been protected by the original patent and specification.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to procure a duplicate of such of the models destroyed by fire on the aforesaid fifteenth day of December, as were most valuable and interesting, and whose preservation would be important to the public; and such as would be necessary to facilitate the just discharge of the duties imposed by law on the Commissioner in issuing patents, and to protect the rights of the public and of patentees in patented inventions and improvements: Provided, That a duplicate of such models may be obtained at a reasonable expense: And provided, also, That the whole amount of expenditure for this purpose shall not exceed the sum of one hundred thousand dollars. And there shall be a temporary board of commissioners, to be composed of the Commissioner of the Patent Office and two other persons to be appointed by the President, whose duty it shall be to consider and determine upon the best and most judicious mode of obtaining models of suitable construction; and, also, to consider and determine what models may be procured in pursuance of, and in accordance with, the provisions and limitations in this section contained. And said commissioners may make and establish all such regulations, terms, and conditions, not inconsistent with law, as in their opinion, may be proper and necessary to carry the provisions of this section into effect, according to its true intent.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, whenever a patent shall be returned for correction and reissue under the thirteenth section of the act to which this is additional, and the patentee shall desire several patents to be issued for distinct and separate parts of the thing patented, he shall first pay, in manner and in addition to the sum provided by that act, the sum of thirty dollars for each additional patent so to be issued: Provided, however, That no patent made prior to the aforesaid fifteenth day of December, shall be corrected and reissued until a duplicate of the model and drawing of the thing as originally invented, verified by oath as shall be required by the Commissioner, shall be deposited in the patent office;

Nor shall any addition of an improvement be made to any patent heretofore granted, nor any new patent be issued for an improvement made in any machine, manufacture, or process, to the original inventor, assignee, or possessor, of a patent therefor, nor any disclaimer be admitted to record until a duplicate model and drawing of the thing originally intended, verified as aforesaid, shall have been deposited in the Patent Office, if the Commissioner shall require the same; nor shall any patent be granted for an invention, improvement, or discovery, the model or drawing of which shall have been lost, until another model and drawing, if required by the Commissioner, shall, in like manner, be deposited in the Patent Office;

And in all such cases, as well as in those which may arise under the third section of this act, the question of compensation for such models and drawings shall be subject to the judgment and decision of the commissioners provided for in the fourth section, under the same limitations and restrictions as are therein prescribed.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That any patent, hereafter to be issued, may be made and issued to the assignee or assignees of the inventor or discoverer, the assignment thereof being first entered of record, and the application therefor being duly made, and the specification duly sworn to by the inventor. And in all cases hereafter, the applicant for a patent shall be held to furnish duplicate drawings, whenever the case admits of drawings, one of which to be deposited in the office, and the other to be annexed to the patent, and considered a part of the specification.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That, whenever any patentee shall have, through inadvertence, accident, or mistake, made his specification of claim too broad, claiming more than that of which he was the original or first inventor, some material and substantial part of the thing patented being truly and justly his own, any such patentee, his administrators, executors, and assigns, whether of the whole or of a sectional interest therein, may make disclaimer of such parts of the thing patented as the disclaimant shall not claim to hold by virtue of the patent or assignment, stating therein the extent of his interest in such patent; which disclaimer shall be in writing, attested by one or more witnesses, and recorded in the Patent Office, on payment by the person disclaiming, in manner as other patent duties are required by law to be paid, of the sum of ten dollars. And such disclaimer shall thereafter be taken and considered as part of the original specification, to the extent of the interest which shall be possessed in the patent or right secured thereby, by the disclaimant, and by those claiming by or under him subsequent to the record thereof. But no such disclaimer shall affect any action pending at the time of its being filed, except so far as may relate to the question of unreasonable neglect or delay in filing the same.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That, whenever application shall be made to the Commissioner for any addition of a newly-discovered improvement to be made to an existing patent, or whenever a patent shall be returned for correction and reissue, the specification of claim annexed to every such patent shall be subject to revision and restriction, in the same manner as are original applications for patents; the Commissioner shall not add any such improvement to the patent in the one case, nor grant the reissue in the other case, until the applicant shall have entered a disclaimer, or altered his specification of claim in accordance with the decision of the Commissioner; and in all such cases, the applicant, if dissatisfied with such decision, shall have the same remedy and be entitled to the benefit of the same privileges and proceedings as are provided by law in the case of original applications for patents.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, any thing in the fifteenth section of the act to which this is additional to the contrary notwithstanding, That, whenever by mistake, accident, or inadvertence, and without any wilful default or intent to defraud or mislead the public, any patentee shall have in his specification claimed to be the original and first inventor or discoverer of any material or substantial part of the thing patented, of which he was not the first and original inventor, and shall have no legal or just right to claim the same, in every such case the patent shall be deemed good and valid for so much of the invention or discovery as shall be truly and bona fide his own, Provided, it shall be a material and substantial part of the thing patented, and be definitely distinguishable from the other parts so claimed, without right as aforesaid. And every such patentee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, whether of the whole or of a sectional interest therein, shall be entitled to maintain a suit at law or in equity on such patent for any infringement of such part of the invention or discovery as shall be bona fide his own as aforesaid, notwithstanding the specification may embrace more than he shall have any legal right to claim. But, in every such case in which a judgment or verdict shall be rendered for the plaintiff, he shall not be entitled to recover costs against the defendant, unless he shall have entered at the Patent Office, prior to the commencement of the suit, a disclaimer of all that part of the thing patented which was so claimed without right: Provided, however, That no person bringing any such suit shall be entitled to the benefits of the provisions contained in this section who shall have unreasonably neglected or delayed to enter at the Patent Office a disclaimer as aforesaid.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner is hereby authorized and empowered to appoint agents in not exceeding twenty of the principal cities or towns in the United States, as may best accommodate the different sections of the country, for the purpose of receiving and forwarding to the Patent Office all such models, specimens of ingredients, and manufactures, as shall be intended to be patented or deposited therein, the transportation of the same to be chargeable to the patent fund.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That, instead of one examining clerk, as provided by the second section of the act to which this is additional, there shall be appointed, in manner therein provided, two examining clerks, each to receive an annual salary of fifteen hundred dollars; and, also, an additional copying clerk, at an annual salary of eight hundred dollars. And the Commissioner is also authorized to employ, from time to time, as many temporary clerks as may be necessary to execute the copying and draughting required by the first section of this act, and to examine and compare records with the originals, who shall receive not exceeding seven cents for every page of one hundred words, and for drawings and comparison of records with originals, such reasonable compensation as shall be agreed upon or prescribed by the Commissioner.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That, whenever the application of any foreigner for a patent shall be rejected and withdrawn for want of novelty in the invention, pursuant to the seventh section of the act to which this is additional, the certificate thereof of the Commissioner shall be a sufficient warrant to the Treasurer to pay back to such applicant two-thirds of the duty he shall have paid into the Treasury on account of such application.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That in all cases in which an oath is required by this act, or by the act to which this is additional, if the person of whom it is required shall be conscientiously scrupulous of taking an oath, affirmation may be substituted therefor.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That all moneys paid into the Treasury of the United States for patents and for fees for copies furnished by the Superintendent of the Patent Office prior to the passage of the act to which this is additional, shall be carried to the credit of the patent fund created by said act; and the moneys constituting said fund shall be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the payment of the salaries of the officers and clerks provided for by said act, and all other expenses of the Patent Office, including all the expenditures provided for by this act; and, also, for such other purposes as are or may be hereafter specially provided for by law. And the Commissioner is hereby authorized to draw upon said fund, from time to time, for such sums as shall be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act, governed, however, by the several limitations herein contained. And it shall be his duty to lay before Congress, in the month of January, annually, a detailed statement of the expenditures and payments by him made from said fund; and it shall also be his duty to lay before Congress, in the month of January, annually, a list of all patents which shall have been granted during the preceding year, designating, under proper heads, the subjects of such patents, and furnishing an alphabetical list of the patentees, with their places of residence; and he shall also furnish a list of all patents which shall have become public property during the same period; together with such other information of the state and condition of the Patent Office, as may be useful to Congress or to the public.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT to provide for continuing the construction, and for the repair of certain roads, and for other purposes, during the year eighteen hundred and thirty-seven.

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of one hundred and ninety thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purpose of continuing the Cumberland road in the State of Ohio; that the sum of one hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, for the purpose of continuing the Cumberland road in the State of Indiana; and the sum of one hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, for the purpose of continuing the Cumberland road in the State of Illinois: Provided, That said road within the State of Illinois shall not be stoned or gravelled, unless it can be done at a cost not greater than the average cost of stoning or gravelling said road within the States of Ohio and Indiana; which sums shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That in all cases where it can be done, it shall be the duty of the superintending officers, to cause the work on said road to be laid off in sections, and let out to the lowest substantial bidder, after due notice.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the second section of an act for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, approved the second day of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, shall not be applicable to expenditures hereafter to be made on said road.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the following sums be and the same are hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, to wit: For the repairs of the Cumberland road east of the Ohio river, seven thousand one hundred and eighty-three dollars and sixty-three cents;

For continuing the construction of the road from the northern boundary of the Territory of Florida, by Marianna to Appalachicola, twenty thousand three hundred and thirteen dollars;

For defraying the expenses incidental to making examinations and surveys under the act of the thirteenth of April, eighteen hundred and twenty-four, and geological and mineralogical surveys and researches in the Indian country, on the public lands, and in the territories of the United States, thirty thousand dollars;

For surveys of a military character, and for the defences of the Atlantic and Western frontiers, fifteen thousand dollars.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the several sums hereby appropriated for the construction of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, shall be replaced by said States respectively, out of the funds reserved to each for laying out and making roads under the direction of Congress, by the several acts passed for the admission of said States into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT for the relief of Abigail Appleton.

Be it enacted, &c., That the pension heretofore granted by law to Abigail Appleton, the widow of Daniel Appleton, pursuant to the provisions of the act entitled "An act in addition to an act giving pensions to the orphans and widows of persons slain in the public or private armed vessels of the United States," and the act to which the same is an addition, subject to the conditions and limitations therein contained, be, and the same is hereby, renewed and continued for an additional term of five years, to commence from the third day of September, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-four, subject to the conditions and limitations aforesaid.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT for the relief of John Jeffers.

Be it enacted, &c., That John Jeffers be, and he is hereby, authorized to surrender the certificate which heretofore issued from the land office at Huntsville, Alabama, to John Sharpe, and which was assigned to said Jeffers by Dixon Stanbach, as administrator of Stephen Heard, for the north-west quarter of section twenty-eight, township six, range two, west of the basis meridian of said land district; and upon such surrender of said certificate, and filing his relinquishment in said land office, the said John Jeffers shall be entitled to a certificate from the register and receiver of said land office for the amount which has been paid on said lands, which shall be received in said office in payment for any lands subject to entry in that land district.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT to grant the Atchafalaya Railroad and Banking Company the right of way through the public lands of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That there be, and is hereby granted to the Atchafalaya Railroad and Banking Company, a corporation created by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, the right of way through such portions of the public land as the road or roads of said company is authorized by its charter to construct, shall pass: Provided, That the portion of the public land occupied thereby shall not exceed eighty feet in width.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the route of said road and its branches, shall, at the expense of the aforesaid company, be surveyed and designated through the public lands by plain marks or monuments, and copies of the field-notes, with plat or plats of the lands, and a description of the said land-marks or monuments, and their connexion with the previous official surveys of the adjacent lands, shall be returned to the office of the Surveyor General of the State of Louisiana, and to the General Land Office in Washington, within sixty days after the said surveys or plats are completed, and which shall be within one year from the date of the passage of this act.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That for such depots, watering-places, and workshops, as may be essential to the convenient use of said road, there is also granted to said company such portion of the public land as they may under like restrictions and conditions, select, on either or each side of said road: Provided, That not more than four acres, to be laid off in a square form, shall be selected for such use or purpose at any one place, and not more than one such square shall be granted for every ten miles of the said road or its branches lying within the public lands; which selections shall be surveyed and returned in the manner aforesaid, and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That so long as the public land in the vicinity of said road and its branches shall remain unsold, the said company shall have permission to take therefrom such materials of earth, stone, or wood, as may be necessary for the construction of said road.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the grants herein contained, as well the use of the public lands, as of the materials for the construction of said road and its branches, shall cease and determine and be of no effect, unless the said road be commenced and completed within the periods fixed by the charter of said company; and, if the said road shall be, at any time after its completion, or during the time of its construction, discontinued or abandoned by said company, the grants and privileges hereby made and allowed shall cease and determine and be of no effect.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT granting a pension to William C. Beard, late a captain in the United States army.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to place the name of William C. Beard, late a captain in the United States army, on the invalid pension-roll, at the rate of seventeen dollars per month, to commence on the first of January, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT further to amend the act incorporating the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company.

Be it enacted, &c., That the act of the General Assembly of Virginia, entitled "An act further to amend the act incorporating the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company," passed the twenty-seventh day of February, eighteen hundred and twenty-nine, be, and the same is hereby assented to and approved.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall, within the District of Columbia, wickedly or maliciously do injury to the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, its embankments, walls, moles, tow-paths, bridges, culverts, drains, or to any part necessary to the uses and purposes of said canal, he, she, or they, shall be liable to a fine of not less than five or more than fifty dollars, to be recovered before any justice of the peace of the District of Columbia; and any such justice may, on his own view, or on application verified by affidavit, to said justice made, issue his warrant, describing the injury committed; and upon conviction, the said justice shall have authority to commit the offender to close jail, without bail or mainprize, until said fine and costs be paid, or until said defendant be discharged by due course of law: Provided, however, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to prevent said canal company from recovering damages from any person or persons who may commit any of the trespasses aforesaid.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all condemnations of land for the use and purposes of said canal company, which have heretofore been made by the marshal of said District, or any lawful deputy marshal, shall be as valid as though the same had been situated in the State of Maryland, and had been condemned in pursuance of the laws of said State, through the action and agency of a sheriff of any of the counties of said State.

By the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

An act further to amend the act incorporating the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, passed February twenty-seventh, eighteen hundred and twenty-nine.

Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company be, and they are hereby empowered, whenever it shall be, in the judgment of the president and directors thereof, expedient, in lieu of bridges to substitute boats, properly fitted, for the transportation of persons, wagons, and carriages, of every description, across the canal, whenever a public or private road shall render a bridge or ferry necessary, and such road cannot conveniently be conducted under the canal.

Be it further enacted, That the said president and directors, acting in behalf of the said company, and with the consent and approbation thereof, expressed at some general meeting thereof, in which a majority in interest of said stock is represented, may sell, let, or otherwise dispose of, any surplus water in any part of the said canal, or of any feeder or reservoir thereof, if they shall be of opinion that no injury will result therefrom to the navigation of the canal.

Be it further enacted, That whenever it may be necessary to form heavy embankments, piers, or moles, at the mouths of creeks, or along the river shore, for basins and other purposes, and the president and directors may deem it expedient to give a greater strength to the same, by widening them, and constructing them of the most solid materials, the ground so formed for such useful purpose may by them, when so improved, be sold out, or let for terms of years, as they may deem most expedient for the company, on such conditions as may direct the application of the proceeds thereof to useful purposes, and at the same time repay the necessary expense of the formation of such embankments, piers, or moles: Provided, That this power shall in no case be exercised so as to injure the navigation of the canal.

This act shall be in force, so far as relates to the eastern section of the canal, on its receiving the assent of the Legislature of Maryland, and of the Congress of the United States, and shall be valid as relates to both sections, on its receiving the further assent of the Legislature of Pennsylvania.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT to authorize the New Orleans and Carrollton Railroad Company to construct a railroad from Carrollton to the town of Bayou Sara, in the State of Louisiana.

Be it enacted, &c., That there be, and is hereby, granted to the New Orleans and Carrollton Railroad Company, incorporated by the Legislature of Louisiana, the right of way through such portion of the public lands remaining unsold, for the extension of their railroad from Carrollton to the town of Bayou Sara, in the said State: Provided, That the portion of the public lands occupied therefor, shall not exceed eighty feet in breadth; that the route of the said road shall be designated and marked on the ground by plain landmarks, within the period of eighteen months from the passage of this act, and a copy of the notes of survey and plat thereof, with a description of the said landmarks, be transmitted to the General Land Office in Washington, within the period aforesaid.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so long as the public lands, in the vicinity of the said road, shall remain unsold, the said company shall have power to take therefrom such materials of earth, stone, and wood, as may be necessary for the construction of the said road: Provided, That the grants herein contained, as well of the use of the public lands as of the materials for the said road, shall cease and determine, unless the same shall be begun within the period of two years from the date of this act, and completed within a period of six years.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT for the relief of Findley Kellock.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be directed to place Findley Kellock, of the State of Maine, on the roll of revolutionary pensioners, and to cause to be paid to the said Kellock, during his natural life, the sum of twenty-nine dollars per annum, the payment thereof to commence on the fourth day of March, anno Domini eighteen hundred and thirty-one.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT for the relief of Alexander Gibson.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War cause the name of Alexander Gibson, of Kentucky, to be restored to the roll of revolutionary pensioners, and that he be paid all arrears due him for his pension since he was last paid, and that he be paid for and during his natural life a pension at the rate of eighty dollars per annum.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT for the relief of David Kilbourn.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, to David Kilbourn, of the county of Oswego, in the State of New York, the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars, for loss of property he sustained in consequence of services rendered by him to the United States on the Northern frontier during the late war with Great Britain.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT for the relief of Ebenezer Breed.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Ebenezer Breed, merchant, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount of duties paid on twenty-one thousand nine hundred and seventy-seven gallons of wine, imported in the brig Gazelle, on the first day of August, in the year eighteen hundred and twenty-nine, into the port of Boston and Charlestown, which wine was destroyed by fire while in the custody of the customs: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury be furnished with satisfactory proof that said goods were so destroyed by fire, and were not insured.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT to amend the charter of the Potomac Fire Insurance Company of Georgetown.

Be it enacted, &c., That the name and style of the said company shall hereafter be the "Potomac Insurance Company of Georgetown;" and in addition to the powers, privileges, and immunities granted to the said company in and by their original act of incorporation, the said company shall have full power and authority to make insurance on vessels, merchandise, freights, and all other interests in or touching property at sea, or going to sea, and on all kinds of marine risks whatsoever; to make insurance on lives, to grant annuities, to receive endowments, to contract for reversionary payments, and to pass all such by-laws as may be necessary to carry these and their other powers into effect, not contrary to the laws of the United States, and from time to time to alter or repeal the same; and to make, execute, and perfect such and so many contracts, bargains, agreements, and other instruments, as shall or may be necessary, and as the nature of the case shall or may require.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the said company, at such time and so often as a majority of the stockholders may agree and so order, to open books and take subscriptions of stock, until the original contemplated capital stock of said company shall be filled.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors of said company may, at their discretion, take security on real estate of at least double the value of the amount to be secured, in lieu of endorsed notes, for the unpaid part of the capital stock; and it shall be lawful for the stockholders to pay up ten dollars per share on any and every share of stock held by him, her, or them, in cash, not oftener than once a year, commencing with the first of July, in the year eighteen hundred and thirty-six, and be entitled to dividend thereon as on other cash stock: Provided, The said payments are made fully six months before the declaration of such dividend.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the foregoing enactments shall be in force and binding on the said company and others, as soon as a written acceptance thereof, adopted by a majority of the stockholders of said company, shall be authentically certified, and filed and recorded in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, for the county of Washington: Provided, That the change in the name of the said company, hereby authorized, shall not affect any proceedings instituted, or liabilities incurred, before the passage of this act, by or against the said Potomac Fire Insurance Company.

AN ACT for the relief of James Keytes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury cause to be issued to James Keytes, assignee of William Ashly, who is assignee of Grant Weed, a patent for a quarter section of land, to be located on any of the public lands in the State of Missouri subject to private entry; which is in lieu of a quarter section which was patented to said Grant Weed, by the United States, on the eleventh day of May, eighteen hundred and nineteen, described as being the northeast quarter of section eleven, in township number fifty-four north, of range twenty south, and which patent appears to have been altered by the Commissioner of the General Land Office on the third day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, by inserting range twenty-one instead of range twenty, so as to make the patent correspond with the record in said office: Provided, nevertheless, That no such location shall be made, or patent issue, until the said Keytes shall file a relinquishment with the register of the land office at Franklin, in the State of Missouri, for the above-named quarter section, in range twenty-one aforesaid.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT to incorporate the President and Directors of the Firemen's Insurance Company of Washington and Georgetown, in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, &c., That French S. Evans and Edmund Hanly, of the Union; Charles L. Coltnan and James H. Smoot, of the Franklin; John Purdy and John H. Goddard, of the Perseverance; Charles K. Gardner and John Lynch, of the Columbia; Marmaduke Dove and William Speiden, of the Navy Yard; George Shoemaker and John H. King, of the Western Star; and Nathaniel Marden and William J. Gozler, of the Vigilant, fire companies, and the subscribers to the stock of the association, and their successors, shall be, and they are hereby declared to be, a body politic and corporate, by the name and style of "The President and Directors of the Firemen's Insurance Company of Washington and Georgetown;" and by that name shall have perpetual succession, and be capable in law to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended, in all courts of law or equity, or elsewhere; and to make and use one common seal, and the same to alter or renew at their pleasure, and generally to do and perform all things relative to the objects of this institution which it now is or shall be lawful for any individual or body politic or corporate to do.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock of this company shall consist of a sum not exceeding two hundred thousand dollars, divided into ten thousand shares, at twenty dollars each. Two dollars shall be paid on each share at the time of subscribing; four months after such subscription and payment, a further instalment of two dollars shall be paid on each share of stock; and notes payable on demand, with security to be approved by the president and directors for the time being, shall be given for the remaining sixteen dollars. The said notes shall be renewed whenever the directors may consider it proper; and any stockholder neglecting or refusing to renew his note, or neglecting or refusing to pay an instalment when required by the directors, shall forfeit all his interest in this company, and be held liable for his proportion of any loss which may have occurred previous to such neglect or refusal.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, should any forfeiture occur, it may be remitted by a majority of the whole board of directors present at the meeting at which the motion for such remission shall be made, upon the payment, by the person incurring a forfeiture, of the principal of said instalment, and the interest thereon up to the time of such payment; as also of his proportion of such loss as may have occurred previous to such forfeiture.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President and directors shall not call on the stockholders for any part of the remaining sixteen dollars per share, secured to be paid as above mentioned, unless the exigencies of the company shall require it, and then only in such proportions as the said stockholders are severally interested, taking care, always, to give sixty days' notice thereof, in the papers in the cities of Washington and Georgetown.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That so soon as five thousand shares are subscribed for and paid, or secured to be paid, the company shall be competent to transact all kinds of business for which it is established.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That each fire company in the city of Washington and Georgetown shall be entitled to subscribe by itself, for its own use, in its corporate capacity, or by means of trustees for the use of said company; or the members of a company may, in their individual capacity, for the use of themselves or the company or companies to which they belong, subscribe for an amount of stock, not to exceed, in the whole, one thousand four hundred and twenty-eight shares for each company: Each company shall open books of subscription for the same, on the first Monday in May, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, and shall deliver the said books and the money paid on the subscription, to the board of directors, so soon as they shall be appointed and prepared to receive the same.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That if any fire company, together with its members, shall not subscribe for the number of one thousand four hundred and twenty-eight shares allotted to them, within the space of three years from the time the books may be opened for subscription, the residue of shares between the amount of their subscription and the said one thousand four hundred and twenty-eight shares, may be subscribed for and taken by the other fire companies, or the members thereof, in equal portions to each company, or in such manner as the directors may determine.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That no person, other than a member of a fire company, shall be entitled to purchase or hold any part of the capital or joint stock of this company; and the share or shares of a stockholder ceasing to be a member of a fire company, shall be purchased at their actual value, by the company to which the said stockholder belonged; or by the members thereof, for their own use, or for the benefit of the said company; or by the board of directors of this association, and may be disposed of by them for its benefit. Upon the decease of a stockholder, his share or shares shall become extinct, his stock notes shall be cancelled, and the actual value of such share or shares, at the time of his decease, together with all profits due thereon to him, shall be paid within six months after such extinction, to his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns. And the directors shall have power to create and dispose of shares equal to the number so extinguished by the death of the said stockholder.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That transfers of stock may be made by any stockholder to the company, or to a member or members of the fire company to which he or they may belong, or to any other fire company, or any member or members thereof; but no transfer shall be valid which is made to any other than a member or members of a fire company.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That every member of any of the companies belonging to the association, shall be entitled to effect insurances at a discount of eight per cent. less than other persons, upon producing to the satisfaction of the directors a certificate of his right of membership; and all the companies associated, or who may hereafter associate under this act, within the cities of Washington and Georgetown, shall be entitled to an equal participation in all the benefits and advantages of the institution, in proportion to the amount of stock held by such company.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the affairs of this company shall be managed by a president and a board of directors, (to be elected as follows,) all of whom shall be stockholders; who, previous to entering on the duties of their respective offices, shall take the following oath or affirmation: "I, A B, do swear [or affirm, as the case may be] that I will faithfully, diligently, impartially, and honestly fulfil the duties of my office of _____ to the best of my knowledge and ability." Each fire company holding, together with the members thereof, one hundred shares of stock, and not more than five hundred, shall be entitled to elect one director. Any fire company holding, together with the members thereof, more than five hundred shares, shall be entitled to elect two directors. Any company, together with the members composing it, holding less than one hundred and seventy-five shares of stock, shall not be entitled to the election of a director. And should it so happen that the number of shares of stock possessed by any one company, together with the members composing it, shall become less than one hundred and seventy-five, then, and in that case, the said company shall not be entitled to the election of a director, until the amount of shares held thereby be increased to the said number of one hundred and seventy-five.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That no director of any other fire insurance company shall be allowed to be a director of this; and should any director of this company be elected a director of any other fire insurance company, his acceptance of that appointment shall, ipso facto, disqualify him from continuing a director of this company, and the company from which such director shall have been delegated shall proceed to fill up the vacancy as is herein-after provided.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the respective companies composing this association, who may be entitled to the election of one or more directors, shall hold separate meetings for the first election of directors, within two weeks after the aforesaid amount of five thousand shares of stock shall be subscribed for, and on the first Monday in January in each and every year thereafter, and choose by ballot, from among their members, the number of directors to which they are entitled; and each stockholder shall have one vote for each share of stock not exceeding five shares; one vote for every five shares over five and not exceeding fifty shares; but no person or body corporate shall have, in any instance, more than twenty votes. The directors so chosen shall serve until the first Monday in January, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, and until others shall be chosen, and no longer. At their first meeting after every election, they shall choose by ballot, a president, either from among their own body, or from amongst the other stockholders; and in case of the death or disqualification of the president, the directors shall fill up the vacancy by ballot. The said directors shall produce (before they enter on the duties herein assigned to them) a certificate signed by the president and secretary of the respective fire companies, of the appointment of such person as director. In case of a director being chosen president, the place of such director for the remainder of the year shall be filled up by the company from which such director was delegated, from among the stockholders of the fire company to which the director so elected belonged.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That, in case of the death, resignation, or disqualification of a director, the place of such director, for the remainder of the year, shall be filled up by the company from which such director was delegated, from the fire company by whom he was elected.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall be, and they are hereby, authorized to make all kinds of insurance against fire, within the limits of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, only, and generally to transact and perform all business relative to the objects aforesaid; and, also, to invest the capital and funds of the company, from time to time, in the public funds of the United States, or in any other stocks, and to dispose of the money and property of the company in such manner (not being contrary to law) as to them shall appear most advantageous to the company.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall declare dividends of the profits of the corporation, or so much thereof as to them shall appear advisable; and in case of any loss or losses, whereby the capital stock of the company shall be lessened, no subsequent dividend shall be made until a sum equal to such diminution, and arising from the profits of the company, shall have been added to the capital.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That the said president and directors shall be, and they are hereby, authorized to retain and set apart out of the profits of the said company, from time to time, as they may think necessary, a portion of said profits, to constitute a fund for the special benefit of such members of the several fire companies belonging to this association as may become injured or disabled in the discharge of their duties at any fire.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That every house insured by this company that is destroyed by means of fire, from the first floor upwards, shall be deemed as demolished; and it shall be lawful for the directors, in such case, to order the money insured thereon to be paid within three months after the notice given of the loss aforesaid.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That, in case of a partial destruction by fire, the loss shall be determined by assessors appointed as follows: the person whose property is insured shall have the privilege of selecting one disinterested person, the board of directors of this association shall select another; should these two persons disagree in their valuation of a loss, they shall select another disinterested person, and their award shall be final.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall have power and authority to appoint a secretary, and such other clerks and officers under them as shall be necessary for transacting the business of said institution, and may allow them, together with the president, such salary as they shall judge reasonable; to ordain and establish such by-laws, ordinances, and regulations as shall appear to them necessary for regulating and conducting the concerns of said institution, not being contrary to or inconsistent with this act or the constitution and laws of the United States; they shall keep full, fair, and correct entries of their transactions, which shall be at all times open to the inspection of the stockholders; they shall also have power to hire or purchase a suitable building or buildings in the city of Washington or Georgetown, for the purpose of transacting the affairs of the institution, and generally to conduct the entire business thereof.

Sec. 21. And be it further enacted, That no stockholder or member of this said company shall be answerable in his person or individual property for any contract or agreement of said company, or for any losses, deficiencies, or failures of the capital stock of this company, except in the case of a director by his vote declaring an improper dividend, but the whole of the said capital stock, together with all property, rights, and credits belonging thereunto, and nothing more, shall at any time be answerable for the demands against said company.

Sec. 22. And be it further enacted, That the stock of this institution may be assigned and transferred on the books of the company in person or by power of attorney only; but no stockholder indebted to the company shall be permitted to make a transfer, or receive a dividend, until such debts paid, or secured to the satisfaction of the president and board of directors.

Sec. 23. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors may call a general meeting of the stockholders for any purpose relative to the affairs of the institution, giving at least two weeks' notice thereof in the newspapers of Washington and Georgetown; and any number of stockholders, not less than one hundred, who, together shall be proprietors of twelve hundred shares, may at any time apply to the president and directors to call a general meeting of the stockholders for any purpose relative to the affairs of the institution; and if the president and directors refuse to call such meeting, the said number of stockholders, proprietors of not less than twelve hundred shares, shall have power to call a general meeting of the stockholders, giving at least two weeks' notice in the said newspapers printed in the cities of Washington and Georgetown, specifying in such notice the object of the meeting.

Sec. 24. And be it further enacted, That, should it so happen, from any cause whatsoever, that the annual election of directors should not take place in any year, on the day hereinbefore mentioned for that purpose, this corporation shall not, for that reason, be dissolved, but such election may be lawfully held on such convenient day thereafter as may for that purpose be fixed on by the president and directors, they causing ten days' public notice thereof to be given in one or more of the newspapers printed in the cities of Washington and Georgetown.

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall have power to appropriate such portions of the profits accruing to the company, to the reduction of the stock notes of the stockholders, as the board of directors shall from time to time deem advisable.

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force until the first day of June, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight.

Sec. 27. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for Congress at any time hereafter to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Approved March 3, 1837.

AN ACT authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to place the name of Doctor John P. Briggs on the navy pension list.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, authorized and required to place upon the list of invalid pensioners of the navy pension fund, at the rate of twenty-five dollars per month, to be paid out of said fund, John P. RESOLUTIONS.

A RESOLUTION to enable the Postmaster General more readily to change the commencement of the contract year in the Post Office Department.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby authorized and empowered to let the contracts for the transportation of the mails in those sections of the United States where they expire on the thirty-first days of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, and eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, respectively, for four years and six months, so as to cause them to terminate on the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, eighteen hundred and forty-three, and eighteen hundred and forty-four, to the end that the contract may commence on the first day of July, instead of the first day of January.

Approved March 2, 1837.

RESOLUTION granting a pension to Susan Decatur, widow of the late Stephen Decatur.

Resolved, &c., That Mrs. Susan Decatur, widow of the late Commodore Stephen Decatur, be paid from the navy pension fund, a pension for five years, commencing from the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, in conformity with the provisions of the act concerning naval pensions and the navy pension fund, passed thirtieth June, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, and that she be allowed from said fund the arrearages of the half pay of a post captain, from the death of Commodore Decatur to the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred thirty-four, together with the pension hereby allowed her, and that the arrearage of said pension be vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, in trust for the use of the said Susan Decatur: Provided, That the said pension shall cease on the death or marriage of the said Susan Decatur.

Approved March 3, 1837.

RESOLUTION to authorize a settlement of the accounts of Orange H. Dibble.

Resolved, &c., That the claims of Orange H. Dibble, for labor, materials, and all other expenses incurred, and losses sustained by him in making preparations to execute his contract for the construction of the bridge across the Potomac, and which have not heretofore been settled and paid, be examined and ascertained by the Secretary of the Treasury, as nearly as the same can be done, and be laid before Congress at its next session for examination. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to apply, in part payment of the same to him, the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for said purpose by the act of the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-four: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury is not authorized to make any allowance to the said O. H. Dibble for the purchase of stone or stone quarries, nor any further sum for his personal services.

Approved March 3, 1837.

RESOLUTION authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to correct a clerical error in the award of the Commissioners under the treaty with France of eighteen hundred and thirty-one.

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed, in making payment of the two last instalments to the claimants under the treaty with France of July four, eighteen hundred and thirty-one, to correct a clerical mistake which occurred in the award of the Commissioners in the case of the claim of the Union Bank of Maryland; by which mistake, the sum of ten thousand dollars, awarded to said bank, has gone to the use of all the other claimants; and that he correct such mistake by making the proper alteration in the proportion to be paid to the several claimants in the two last instalments, so that all the claimants shall obtain their just proportion of the whole indemnity, and no more.

Approved March 3, 1837.

A RESOLUTION authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to receive from the Bank of the United States, under the Pennsylvania charter, payment for the stock of the United States, in the late Bank of the United States.

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to accept the terms of settlement proposed by the president and directors of the Bank of the United States, under the Pennsylvania charter, in their memorial to Congress, presented at the present session, for the payment to the United States of the capital stock owned by them in the late Bank of the United States, and the final adjustment and settlement of the claims connected with or arising out of the same; and to take such obligation for the payment of the several instalments in said proposed terms of settlement mentioned, as he may think proper: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prejudice or affect in any way the question between the General Government of the United States and the late Bank of the United States, respecting the claim for damages on account of the protest of the bill of exchange drawn on the French Government.

Approved March 3, 1837.
